VATICAN CITY — Pope Benedict XVI closed the Synod of Bishops on the Bible by preaching a lesson on love of God and neighbor, saying the word of God must be put into practice through service to others.

The concluding liturgy came after the pope accepted 55 final synod propositions, including a proposal that women be admitted to the official ministry of lector, or Scripture reader, at Mass.

Joined by more than 250 bishops at a Mass Oct. 26 in St. Peter's Basilica, the pope said

A MISSION OF FAITH IN MEXICO

U.S. Maryknoll lay missionary Kathy Vargas (right) spends time with Bertha Ramirez Perea in the L'Arche community home for the developmentally challenged in Queretaro, Mexico, Oct. 2. Vargas has worked almost four decades as a missionary in Mexico.

Despite hardships, American in Mexico recommends mission life

QUERETARO, Mexico (CNS) — Through almost four decades of missionary work, American Kathy Vargas has had to suffer through threats, hardship and indifference.

In the 1970s, wealthy landowners in the jungles of Chiapas state threatened Vargas and her husband for evangelizing to indigenous groups and teaching them to defend their rights. In the '80s, the couple saw their Mexico City neighborhood devastated by an earthquake.

More recently, Vargas has faced a struggle to raise funds and get the government interested in a community center that teaches self-respect and civic values to thousands of schoolchildren.

She shrugs off these difficulties.

"I recommend mission life, highly," said Vargas, a Maryknoll lay missionary since the mid-1980s. The rewards, she said, outweigh the difficulties "one hundredfold."

Vargas, who grew up in Ohio, arrived in San Cristobal de Las Casas in 1970 as a Maryknoll sister. She spoke no Spanish and she soon realized being a nun was not her calling. But she had met then-Bishop Samuel Ruiz Garcia of San Cristobal de Las Casas, an advocate of indigenous rights, who invited her to work in the diocese.

So in 1973, she went to work as a lay member of the pastoral team in the town of Ocosingo, where missionaries had access to many of the indigenous populations. That same year she married Javier Vargas, a Mexico City native who had been working in Chiapas as a missionary for more than a decade. Between 1973 and 1981, the couple had three children and adopted a fourth.

At the time, wealthy ranchers regularly seized land and pushed indigenous groups farther into the isolated, undeveloped jungle. There they celebrated weddings, baptisms and other sacraments together on the few days of a year when a priest could get to the village by donkey.

In addition to pastoral work, Kathy and Javier Vargas also helped translate Mexican agrarian law for local residents to understand and defend their rights.

With hostilities from ranchers rising, the family moved to San Cristobal to continue working with indigenous groups. In 1981, they moved to Mexico City where Vargas helped organize day care co-ops for working mothers.

She helped organize healthy-baby clinics and put rural farmers in touch with local buyers to improve profits. She and her husband also helped with relief efforts following the 1985 earthquake that killed an estimated 10,000 Mexico City residents.

Rising crime led the Vargas family to move in 1993 to Queretaro, where Vargas helped launch the Queretaro Community Foundation, which coordinates programs for public schools.

The foundation, where Vargas is a board member but receives no salary, also offers extracurricular and civic responsibility programs for children, directs courses to improve the abilities of nongovernmental organizations and advises regional companies on issues such as employee relations and environmental responsibility.

Vargas also serves as a leader for L'Arche, which administers a community home for those with developmental challenges.

She said her efforts "continue to be driven by faith."

"It's wonderful, the mission experience, in that it strips away all of your props and all the things you could fall back on in your own culture, and it makes you very vulnerable," she said. "But the vulnerability itself is what allows you to grow into a different person."

Orissa government expedites case of nun raped by Hindu fanatics

NEW DELHI (CNS) — The Orissa state government has decided to expedite the case of a Catholic nun who was raped during the recent anti-Christian violence in the eastern Indian state.

The move came after the nun spoke at a press conference Oct. 24 in the Jesuit-managed Indian Social Institute in New Delhi.

The 28-year-old nun, who addressed the media with her face covered up to her eyes, was flanked by another nun and a female lawyer.

She fought tears while reading a four-page handwritten statement recounting how Hindu fanatics attacked her. She said she had no faith in the Orissa police, whom she alleged refused to help her but aided her attackers.

A day after the nun met the press, Orissa Chief Minister Naveen Patnaik convened a meeting in the state capital and directed officials to speed up the case.

The nun was raped Aug. 25, the day after Hindu fanatics began weeks of sustained violence against Christians in Orissa in response to the murder of a Hindu leader. The violence left at least 58 people dead.

Radical Hindu groups in the media accused the nun of not cooperating and of hiding from the police. They also demanded that she marry her rapist.

The nun met the press three days after the Supreme Court rejected a church petition that sought to have the Central Bureau of Investigation, the premier federal investigation agency, investigate the rape.

The Supreme Court asked the nun to cooperate with the state police investigation after the Orissa government said in an affidavit that the investigation into the case was progressing and that police already had arrested eight people.

Vatican finishes work on psychological testing of seminary candidates

VATICAN CITY — The Vatican has finished work on a long-awaited document on the psychological testing of seminary candidates.

The document, titled "Guidelines for the Use of Psychology in the Admission and Formation of Candidates for the Priesthood," was released at a Vatican press conference Oct. 30.

The text was prepared by the Congregation for Catholic Education, which had worked on the document for at least six years.

In 2005, Pope John Paul II told the education congregation that a candidate's ability to live a life of priestly celibacy must be "carefully verified" so that there is moral certainty about the candidate's emotional and sexual maturity.

"In light of present-day social and cultural changes, it can be at times useful that educators turn to the work of competent specialists to help seminarians comprehend more thoroughly the requirements of the priesthood, recognizing celibacy as a gift of love to the Lord and to one's brothers," Pope John Paul said.

Later in 2005, the congregation issued norms that ruled out the priestly ordination of homosexuals, but without spelling out who should determine whether a candidate had homosexual tendencies.

Sources have said one reason the document took so long to prepare was that the psychological testing of priesthood candidates remains a controversial issue at the Vatican.

Speaking at the press conference was Cardinal Zenon Grocholewski, prefect of the education congregation; Archbishop Jean-Louis Brugues, secretary of the congregation; and Father Carlo Bresciani, a psychologist and a consultant to the congregation who has written on bioethics and sexual morality.

Pope to visit Africa in March to help prepare for October synod

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Pope Benedict XVI announced that he plans to make his first trip to Africa next March, visiting Cameroon and Angola.

The pope will make the trip to help prepare for the Synod of Bishops on Africa, scheduled for October 2009, and to mark the 500th anniversary of the evangelization of Angola.

He announced the trip Oct. 26 at a closing Mass for the Synod of Bishops on the Bible. When he repeated the announcement shortly afterward to pilgrims gathered in St. Peter's Square, a wave of applause swept through the crowd.

Sub-Saharan Africa has not hosted a pope since 1998, when Pope John Paul II visited Nigeria.

Pope Benedict said his intention was to meet with representatives from African bishops' conferences in Cameroon and hand-deliver the African synod's "instrumentum laboris," or working document.

The Synod of Bishops will be the second for Africa and is scheduled to take place in Rome. The theme is "The Church in Africa at the Service of Reconciliation, Justice and Peace."

The first African synod took place at the Vatican in 1994. Ten years later, Pope John Paul said another synod would be held to allow church leaders to address the continent's changing religious, demographic, social and political scenes.

Pope Benedict said he would go from Cameroon to Angola, where he will celebrate the 500th anniversary of that country's evangelization.

The Angolan church has been marking different stages of the 500th anniversary for many years, beginning with Pope John Paul's visit there in 1992.

Exact dates for Pope Benedict's trip have not been released. The Vatican's advance team was in Africa in mid-October to firm up preparations.

Pope Benedict has made 10 foreign trips since his election in 2005. So far, the African trip is the only one on his calendar for 2009.

First advocate graduates from online training program

COURTESY PHOTO

Joyce Eckart (center), a parishioner of St. Therese Church in Mooresville, is congratulated on her graduation from the online advocacy training program by Jesuit Father Joe Kappes, parochial vicar, and Joy Barnes, diocesan tribunal advocate, at the church Oct. 8.

Eckart to assist in marriage annulment processes

CHARLOTTE — A local Catholic has become the first in the Diocese of Charlotte to graduate from the diocesan tribunal's online Advocacy Training Course.

Joyce Eckart, a parishioner of St. Therese Church in Mooresville, completed the training Oct. 8.

The tribunal, or church court, handles the marriage nullity process, working under a set of procedures and laws established as part of the universal law of the Catholic Church.

As an advocate, Eckart will help fellow parishioners navigate the Catholic Church's annulment process. She will represent one of the parties in a case — advising, helping assemble the case and speaking for that party in the process.

Eckart's online training began in June. Within four months, she completed the course and took the oath of office, which binds all advocates to protect the privacy of all parties involved in the annulment process.

Eckart has already begun working with new cases at St. Therese Church under the supervision of a mentor and will soon be appointed by Bishop Peter J. Jugis as a tribunal officer.

She is also a 2007 graduate of the diocesan lay ministry program.

"It was during those two years that the Holy Spirit guided me to the advocate program," said Eckart.

As an advocate, Eckart feels she can help bring Catholics back to the sacraments.

"I believe that marriage is hard work and requires graces that are strengthened because of one's relationship with God and the church community," she said.

"Thoughtful Catholics who want to reconnect with the community and be strengthened in the Eucharist need our support," she added.

Prior to 2008, diocesan tribunal advocates were trained in a classroom setting. The program was taken online this year to allow students to work at their own pace and from their own homes.

"I believe that the e-mail format allowed me to continue in the program," said Eckart. "With fuel prices and my busy schedule, realistically I might not have been able to complete the course."

During the online training, lessons are emailed to the students. Exercises or case studies for each lesson are submitted the same way and then returned to the students with comments, along with the next lesson.

"The feedback provided was clear and on target," said Eckart. "In every case, it clarified my thinking."

There are currently 10 advocates in training from cities around the 46-county Diocese of Charlotte.

In fall 2007, an advocate was assigned to each of the 92 parishes and missions in the diocese. As the Catholic population continues to grow, the advocates have become the "hands and feet" of the tribunal in many of the outlying churches.

Poor prenatal diagnosis conference held in Charlotte

CHARLOTTE — People from around the Diocese of Charlotte attended a conference on poor prenatal diagnosis (PPD) at the diocesan Pastoral Center in Charlotte Oct. 24.

The conference, themed "God's Children, God's Blessing: A Community-Based Response to Poor Prenatal Diagnosis," was hosted by Elizabeth Ministry in conjunction with the diocesan Respect Life Program of Catholic Social Services' Family Life Office.

The purpose of the conference was to help the Catholic community better encourage parents to carry their babies to term after a PPD, the detection of a fetal defect by way of prenatal screening tests.

With little or no information or resources available that support the option of carrying a baby with a PPD to term, 80 percent of these pregnancies end in abortion, according to Tammy Tate, founder and director of Carolina Perinatal Support Network in Greenville, S.C., who spoke at the conference.

"We are fortunate to have a service in place at St. Mark's (Church in Huntersville) that will first and foremost connect parents who are currently carrying to term with others who have done so previously," said Tracy Winsor, Elizabeth Ministry regional perinatal bereavement coordinator.

Elizabeth Ministry is an international outreach designed to support women and their families during the joys and sorrows of the childbearing years.

The Elizabeth Ministry at St. Mark Church recently initiated a perinatal hospice service.

"Its purpose is to support parents in dealing with the shock, grief and terrible sense of isolation that comes with the news of a fetal defect. In this diocese, no one has to be alone in that experience," said Winsor.

"You began your marriage with the celebration of the sacrament of holy matrimony. At that moment the Lord invited you to build your marriage as a solid foundation of Christ and at every Mass since then, you have continued to strengthen your marriage with the Lord's grace," said the bishop.

"Every vocation in the church is a response to Christ's love. The Lord called you to married life and to family life, and it is the Lord who sustains you in living out the daily commitment," said Bishop Jugis.

"May this anniversary Mass today help you turn in gratitude to God for his love and his blessings," he said.

After the Mass, the anniversary couples and their families joined Bishop Jugis for a reception in the parish hall.

Foundation gives grant to parish school

The $3,500 grant was issued by the Foundation of the Roman Catholic Diocese of Charlotte and presented to Dominican Sister Anastacia Pagulayan, Sacred Heart School principal, Sept. 14.

"The grants are directed toward educational efforts in assisting the parishes in various programs," said Ray Paradowski, foundation president.

"In this particular case at Sacred Heart School, it was a program to have direct tutoring," he said.

This is the second year that the program has received funding from the diocesan foundation. The tutoring program last year was done after school.

"This year we felt a better use of the money would be to do it in school as the children were going through things that were unfamiliar or that were challenging," said Frances Rash, a part-time employee of the school who initiated the tutoring program.

"It's very beneficial and our children need this service," said Rash of the program, which serves children who are identified by their teachers as needing extra review or one-on-one attention.

The program covers a wide variety of students and a wide variety of academic abilities, said Rash.

The tutor is a certified teacher who meets with the students once a week, "either working with them in the classroom or pulling them out for individual work," said Rash.

It is important that "our teachers know that there is someone there who can support them and help keep the children on track," she said.

Bettering environment may depend on political climate include increasing to 10 percent by 2012, and to 25 percent by 2025, the amount of electricity coming from renewable sources; weatherizing 1 million homes annually; making greater efforts at energy efficiency; prioritizing the construction of the Alaska natural gas pipeline; and developing and deploying "clean coal" technology — although environmental advocates scoff at the concept, saying that mining practices and emissions from coal-fired plants means there's no such thing as clean coal.

Republican Sen. John McCain's campaign platform does not get into as many specifics as Obama's, save for a target for greenhouse gas emission cuts: returning emissions to 2005 levels by 2012, with subsequent benchmarks in 2020, 2030, and 2050, at which point emissions would be 66 percent below 2005 levels.

McCain embraces the "cap and trade" process found in the proposed Climate Security Act.

The Climate Security Act is a federal effort that would set a limit on greenhouse gas emissions and allow entities to buy and sell rights to emit such gases.

"The key feature of this mechanism is that it allows the market to decide and encourage the lowest-cost compliance options," the McCain campaign's Web site says.

McCain's energy platform further calls for market-based solutions, technological advances and international engagement to combat climate change.

"As the science has become clearer, the Congress and the current president have become more engaged in climate change. Most of those science questions are answered," said Dan Misleh, executive director of the Catholic Coalition on Climate Change.

"Congress needs to — and the current and future president need to — think about ways in which we can mitigate climate change."

The next president "will need to demonstrate some fairly serious and significant leadership in terms of the environment, but significantly, in terms of climate change," Misleh added.

"Someone has to be able to designate through very concrete ways that we need to put less greenhouse gases into the atmosphere," he told CNS.

"Besides the regulations and public policy changes, they also need to include clear measures that will protect poor people from the effects of climate change, both at home and abroad," he said.

Leveraging issues

As Obama and McCain battle it out for the presidency, Catholic and other faith-based activists are studying the political environment to see how they can leverage environmental issues into policy come Jan. 20 and beyond.

In July, the Conference of Major Superiors of Men and the Leadership Conference of Women Religious, together representing more than 86,000 vowed men and women religious, jointly resolved to "seek concrete ways to curb environmental degradation, mitigate its impact on the poorest and most vulnerable people and restore right relationships among all God's creation; and to foster a consciousness of care for God's creation among all our members, colleagues, institutions and those whom we serve."

According to a report by the Commission to Engage African-Americans on Climate Change, African-Americans are more than twice as likely as whites to live in cities where the so-called "heat island" effect is expected to make temperature increases more severe.

At the same time, more blacks will be "fuel poor" as energy demand rises because of higher air-conditioning loads, population growth and urbanization.

The National Catholic Rural Life Conference, as a member of the Sustainable Agriculture Coalition, is involved in developing a climate change position paper that will include a section on recommendations for education and research.

The Iowa-based rural life conference also will conduct "Raise Your Voice" workshops in dioceses for a year starting this fall to increase knowledge about climate change and its effects, and to demonstrate how Catholics can affect local, state and federal policy through work with the media and elected officials — "with an emphasis on the federal level," said conference science and environmental education specialist Tim Kautza.

Not enough time remains for the current Congress to pass the proposed Climate Security Act, said Paul Gorman, executive director of the National Religious Partnership for the Environment, of which the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops is a member, but he said frank discussion with lawmakers kept the bill from being weakened.

Under the measure 10 percent of the revenues that would come from selling U.S. carbon emissions credits would provide assistance for poor nations affected by global warming.

"Unless we can engage with developing nations you're not going to have agreements to curtail global warming," Gorman said, adding that $200 billion-$300 billion in revenue was at stake.

Yet retiring Sen. John Warner, R-Va., a co-sponsor of the measure, excised that provision "under a lot of pressure from Republicans in the Senate and the White House," Gorman told Catholic News Service. "When people in the faith community heard about this, there was really very, very fierce concern. They got together with Warner and with (Sens. Joseph) Lieberman (I-Conn.) and Barbara Boxer (D-Calif.) ... and said, 'If you take out a provision like this, faith groups are not going to be able to support this bill.'"

Warner backed down and reinserted the provision. Why?

"For the first time in the 18 years I've been working on this, it was the first time the religious community was unified," Gorman said. "They were really committed to doing something about an actual piece of legislation, and they were able to constitute a significant political force and threat."

The Senate committee got the message. They were really surprised," he said, adding "we were coming from authentic moral principle, we had done our homework and we made the case."

Environmental justice

In 1990, in the first paragraph of his World Day of Peace message, Pope John Paul II said that peace was threatened not only by war and aggression, but also by "lack of due respect for nature, by the plundering of natural resources and by a progressive decline in the quality of life."

"The sense of precariousness and insecurity that such a situation engenders is a seedbed for collective selfishness, disregard for others and dishonesty."

Pope John Paul's successor, Pope Benedict XVI, continues to preach on environmental themes.

"The concerns for nonviolence, sustainable development, justice and peace, and care for our environment are of vital importance for humanity," he said in Sydney, Australia, in July for World Youth Day.

"They cannot, however, be understood apart from a profound reflection upon the innate dignity of every human life from conception to natural death: a dignity conferred by God himself," said the pope.

Although many point to Pope John Paul's message as the joining of Catholic social teaching to environmental issues, U.S. Catholics can point to antecedents in the 1975 pastoral letter "This Land Is Home To Me" by 25 bishops of the Appalachian region, and the 1980 pastoral on rural issues, "Strangers and Guests," by 72 bishops of the Midwest.

Since then, the U.S. bishops collectively, individually and in regional groupings have addressed environmental justice issues, including the USCCB's 2001 statement, "Global Climate Change: A Plea for Dialogue, Prudence and the Common Good."

"Caring for God's creation means not only saving the animals and trees, but protecting humanity as well. Of particular concern to the church is how climate change and the response to it will affect poor and vulnerable people here at home and around the world," said Cecilia Calvo, project coordinator of the environmental justice program of the USCCB's Department of Justice, Peace and Human Development, in an online essay posted at the bishops' "Faithful Citizenship" Web site.

The bishops' 2007 document "Forming Consciences for Faithful Citizenship: A Call to Political Responsibility," Calvo added, "urges Catholics to consider environmental issues before going to vote."

Pope says Bible is put into practice through service

the synod had highlighted a fundamental truth: that the church's missionary activity will fall flat unless it is nourished by scriptural reading and understanding.

Those who think they've understood Scripture but fail to implement its most important teachings — in particular, the double commandment to love God and neighbor — “show that they are still far from having grasped its profound meaning,” he said.

There is “a singular connection that exists between listening to God and unselfish service to one's brothers and sisters,” he said.

The papal liturgy closed an intense three-week period of speech-giving, small-group discussion and elaboration of final recommendations by the 253 voting members of the synod and some 50 other observers and experts.

One of the synod's strongest recommendations was to improve the scriptural aspect of homilies, and the pope seemed to offer a model at the closing Mass.

Examining St. Matthew's account of Christ's words on the “greatest commandment,” the pope began by looking at the historical context of Judaic law and the originality of what Christ was proposing.

Then he drew connections with the previous readings from the Book of Exodus and a letter of St. Paul to underscore a crucial point: “To be disciples of Christ is to put into practice his teachings, which are summarized in the first and greatest commandment of divine law, the commandment of love.”

The pope said the synod had helped the church focus on the importance of Scripture, and he urged participants to return home and launch a program of scriptural renewal in their dioceses and parishes.

He expressed his disappointment that bishops from mainland China were not allowed by their government to attend the synod. He paid tribute to the Chinese bishops' “communion with the universal church and their fidelity to the successor of the apostle Peter,” and assured them they were in the synod's prayers.

On Oct. 25, the last working day of the synod, the pope lunched with participants, joking that he had probably violated international human rights principles by making them work late into the night and on Sundays during the assembly.

“We'll have to see what can be done to improve this for the next synod,” he said.

Synod propositions

The synod's propositions, all of which were approved overwhelmingly, were presented to the pope along with an invitation to prepare a document on the topics raised during the assembly.

Proposition 17 asked that “the ministry of lector be opened also to women, so that their role as proclaimers of the word may be recognized in the Christian community.” Women already act as Scripture readers, but cannot be installed officially in such a ministry, which is reserved to males.

It was unclear what the pope would do with the proposal, which would appear to require a derogation of canon law. Some Vatican sources said that, if approved, it would have to be emphasized that the ministry of lector arises from baptism and not from any connection to priestly ordination.

An issue that was the subject of four synod propositions was the need to strengthen the theological perspective in exegesis, or scriptural interpretation. Reflecting one of the pope's expressed concerns, it said the study of Scripture cannot be reduced simply to a historical analysis of biblical texts.

In its propositions, the synod identified several areas needing further study or guidance:

— Proposition 12 suggested that the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith clarify “the concepts of the inspiration and the truth of the Bible” in order to make more understandable the Second Vatican Council's teaching on the question.

— Proposition 15 asked for a “homiletic directory” to help priests in preparing homilies. Such a directory would cover the principles of homiletics and the art of communication and would present biblical themes that recur in liturgical readings.

— Proposition 47 asked the Vatican to conduct a study on “the phenomenon of the sects,” citing deep concerns over their growing popularity in traditionally Catholic countries.

Often, it said, these sects attract followers by promising “an illusory happiness through the Bible, often interpreted in a fundamentalist way.”

— Proposition 16 asked for an examination of the Roman Lectionary, the book of Scripture readings for Mass, to see if “the current selection and ordering of readings is truly adequate to the church's mission in this historical moment.”

In particular, it asked that the Old Testament receive greater attention in the lectionary.

On another liturgical question, the synod suggested that moments of silence be more universally adopted between the first and second readings at Mass and at the end of the homily.

It emphasized that scriptural readings never should be substituted with other “spiritual or literary texts,” which it said “can never attain the value and the richness contained in holy Scripture.”

The synod propositions thanked laypeople, in particular catechists and leaders of small communities, for their help in promoting scriptural understanding, especially in places where priests are absent.

But, sounding a note of liturgical caution, the synod also recommended the formulation of “ritual directories” to help ensure that where catechists lead Sunday services such celebrations “are not confused with the eucharistic liturgy.”

Religious freedom

The synod, reflecting an ongoing theme of the assembly, said the connection between Scripture and evangelization needs to be better understood. It said the call to the Gospel must be “explicit, done not only inside our churches, but everywhere” and must be accompanied by the daily witness of the faith.

Missionary activity will often lead to persecution, the synod said. It appealed to civil authorities to respect and protect religious freedom.

On a basic point made by bishops from developing countries, Proposition 42 said many local communities lack Bibles translated into their own languages. It encouraged an effort to train translation specialists.

Proposition 53 dealt with dialogue with Muslims, but did not specifically mention scriptures. Instead, it insisted on “the importance of respect for life, the rights of men and women, and the distinction between the social-political order and the religious order in promoting justice and peace in the world.”

In a line added as an amendment, it said another important theme of Catholic-Muslim dialogue was “reciprocity and the freedom of conscience and of religion.”

Proposition 54 treated the theme of ecology, urging greater pastoral and theological emphasis on the connection between Scripture and current efforts to safeguard the created world.

To obey and act

Synod message says each Catholic should own — and use — Bible

BY CINDY WOODEN
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

Editor's note: This is part of a series on the Bible.

VATICAN CITY — Devotion to the word of God must lead Catholics to prayer, concrete acts of charity, unity with other Christians and dialogue with all people of good will, said the world Synod of Bishops.

In their final message to the world's Catholics, the 253 members of the synod said each Catholic should have a copy of the Bible, read it and pray with it regularly.

"Every home should have its own Bible and safeguard it in a visible and dignified way, to read it and to pray with it," said the synod's message, released Oct. 24.

And, like Jesus who came to proclaim hope and salvation, "the Christian has the mission to announce this divine word of hope by sharing with the poor and the suffering, through the witness of faith in the kingdom of truth and life, of holiness and grace, of justice, and love and peace," the synod said.

"Authentic hearing is obeying and acting. It means making justice and love blossom in life," the message said.

It is not enough to explain the word of God to others, the bishops said, but people must let others see and experience the goodness of God through the good that they do.

Archbishop Gianfranco Ravasi, president of the Pontifical Council for Culture and principal drafter of the message, told reporters that "if the word of God is love, then one who has read and prayed over the word must incarnate love. It must lead to communion, solidarity and dialogue."

Shared unity

Nearing the end of a synod that featured for the first time a major address by the spiritual leader of the world's Orthodox Christians, Ecumenical Patriarch Bartholomew of Constantinople, the bishops also insisted that "veneration and love for the word of God" is "the principle and source of a first and real unity" that Catholics share with other Christians.

"This bond must always be reinforced" through joint work on biblical translations, the distribution of Bibles, shared prayer, dialogue and study about differing approaches to interpretation and "the common witness of the word of God in a secularized world," the message said.

The bishops said the fact that Christians and Jews both recognize and love the Old Testament calls them to an "intense encounter" with each other.

In learning more about Judaism, Christians can learn more about Jesus and his disciples who were Jewish and can enrich their understanding of the Bible by studying Jewish traditions of interpretation, they said.

Because Muslims recognize biblical themes, figures and symbols and witness to faith "in the one, compassionate and merciful God, the creator of all beings and judge of humanity," Christians also are invited to dialogue with them, the synod said.

Buddhists' "respect for life, contemplation, silence, simplicity (and) renunciation," Hinduism's "sense of the sacred, sacrifice, pilgrimage, fasting and sacred symbols" and Confucianism's promotion of "wisdom and family and social values" also are fertile grounds for dialogue, the bishops said.

In their message, the bishops explained the various forms the word of God has taken: the spoken word that created the universe and can still be seen in nature; the Bible, the record of the history of salvation written under the inspiration of the Holy Spirit; and Jesus Christ, the word made flesh.

"Therefore, the word of God precedes and goes beyond the Bible," the synod members said, so true devotion to the word of God excludes a fundamentalist reading of the Scriptures.

Fundamentalism "does not recognize that this word (of God) expresses itself in the Bible according to a human language that must be decoded, studied and understood," said the synod message.

'Place of encounter'

Auxiliary Bishop Santiago Silva Retamales of Valparaiso, Chile, vice president of the synod's message-drafting committee, told reporters that the Bible's importance flows from the fact that it is "a place of encounter with the Word who is Lord."

"A book cannot listen, a book cannot console, a book cannot challenge, but the Lord does," he said.

Documenting the creation of man and woman, their struggles with sin and oppression, God's liberating action and his gift of salvation in Jesus, "the Bible contains the model for the process of liberation," Bishop Silva said.

In Latin America and many other parts of the world, he said, the poor come together to read the Bible, and they are touched by Jesus.

"They come aware of their dignity as men and women. They come to understand better and act on their identity as disciples of Jesus Christ," the bishop said.

"And, little by little, the conviction and enthusiasm of being Christian leads them to a new commitment in society, bringing to it the leaven of the values of the kingdom of God," he said.

German publishing house to release complete works of pope

Pope Benedict XVI personally approves project, insists it carries his birth name

BY CINDY WOODEN
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

VATICAN CITY — Over the next eight years, the German publishing giant Herder and the Pope Benedict XVI Institute of Regensburg, Germany, will offer the public "The Complete Works of Joseph Ratzinger."

Presenting the first volume in the 16-tome series, Bishop Gerhard Muller of Regensburg told reporters Oct. 22 that Pope Benedict XIV personally approved the project and insisted that it carry his birth name.

Bishop Muller said the pope wants to make it clear that the works, almost all of which were completed before his election in 2005, reflect his personal theological thought and not the magisterial teaching of the church.

Salesian Father Giuseppe Costa, director of the Vatican Publishing House, which controls the copyright of all the written work of the pope, including the writings in the series, said discussions already are under way with the U.S.-based Ignatius Press to publish English translations of the volumes.

The preface to the first published volume, dedicated to articles, lectures and homilies about the liturgy, is signed "Benedict XVI."

"When, after some hesitation, I decided to take on the project of the publication of my collected works, it was clear to me that the priorities of the (Second Vatican) Council were the most important, which is why liturgy had to be first," the pope wrote.

The liturgy volume includes his 2000 book, "The Spirit of the Liturgy."

In the volume's preface, Pope Benedict said that, unfortunately, the only thing most people know about the book is that it is the place where he discusses the direction the priest faces during Mass.

"At a certain point, I had even thought of striking that chapter, which was nine pages in a 200-page work, so that what I really wanted to say would come out," he said in the preface.

Pope Benedict said that after his book came out in 2000, two other well-known works have appeared showing "that the idea of the priest and people facing each other is a modern invention. The priest and people do not pray to each other, but to God."

While he had written in 2000 that he did not think it was a good idea to remodel churches and place the main altars back against the wall, in the preface to the liturgy volume of his collected works he said was pleased with the solution of placing a crucifix in the middle of the altar "so that the priest and people look together toward the Lord."

"But," he wrote, "maybe once again I have gone on too long about what is only a detail" in a book meant to highlight the importance of the liturgy for the life and faith of the church.

Bishop Muller said each volume would include already published and well-known works along with homilies or lectures never previously published and a complete catalogue of references to other articles, homilies and letters by Joseph Ratzinger on the same subject.

The next volume, due out in March, contains the future pope's postdoctoral thesis on the doctrine of revelation in the works of St. Bonaventure, Bishop Muller said.

The only work originally published after Pope Benedict's election to be featured in the series, he said, will be the pope's 2007 book, "Jesus of Nazareth" and its anticipated second volume.

The large volume containing them will also include older material on the pope's views about Christology.

Bringing the Gospel to the public square

BY JEAN DENTON
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

A couple of weeks before the presidential election, I attended a lecture at a local college given by the acclaimed Catholic theologian and author Father Richard John Neuhaus.

He said it is imperative for Christians to bring Gospel values into the "public square."

Politics is the deliberation of how we as a society should order our lives, he explained, and morality — our understanding of right and wrong — necessarily is part of such deliberation and so should be part of the public conversation.

In the United States, a democratic society in which the culture holds the will of the people to be sovereign, he added, Christians contribute a deep sense of morality through their faith in the life and message of Jesus.

"You can't exclude people's convictions just because they are religious in nature," contended Father Neuhaus, who has written extensively on the role of religion in the contemporary world.

"We are bearers of the undisputed sovereignty of Jesus Christ," he stressed, urging Christians to bring their beliefs to the political arena.

This weekend's Scriptures speak about human temptation to submit to worldly principles and Jesus' presence among us for the sake of saving the world from the powers of darkness.

In writing to the Corinthians, Paul reminded them, as Father Neuhaus reminded us, that we are bearers of Christ in our world. The foundation of the world was Jesus, Paul said, and so people must "be careful" how they build on that foundation.

We are called to infuse human society with the life in which it is founded.

In the Gospel, Jesus makes it clear that this does not work conversely. There is no place in the house of God for the tainted temporal values of the marketplace.

He promises that if we choose those values over him, society won't stand, and he will rebuild it according to his plan of love, justice and peace.

"The truth of Jesus Christ will be vindicated," Father Neuhaus said, reminding his audience of the minuscule part any one of us has in God's plan: "We can only hope that in our little moment we are faithful in keeping the truth."

Questions:

What values of our popular culture compete with Jesus' message in your own decision making? How can you personally bring the Gospel into the public square?

Scripture to be Illustrated:

"You are God's ... building. ... But each one must be careful how he builds upon it, for no one can lay a foundation other than the one that is there, namely Jesus Christ" (1 Corinthians 3:9-10-11).

Catholic gospel music making a joyful noise unto the Lord

BY MARK PATTISON
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

WASHINGTON — It may seem as if gospel music has been with us all our lives. But the genre didn't begin until Thomas Dorsey, widely regarded as the father of gospel music, changed his tune.

A blues pianist who once recorded the raunchy "Tight Like That," which sold an amazing 7 million copies, he dabbled in what were at the time called "evangelistic songs," getting two of them published in the Gospel Book, a publication of the National Baptist Convention, a predominantly African-American denomination.

Dorsey took credit for coining the term "gospel songs" — church music with a blues underpinning. His dabbling had become a mission by the time his first wife died in childbirth in 1932, after which he wrote the much-loved "Precious Lord, Take My Hand."

Dorsey went on to write more than 300 songs, helping to create a genre that came to be known as gospel music.

Catholic gospel music didn't get started until a few decades later, thanks in part to the renewal and aggiornamento, or updating, of the church brought about by the Second Vatican Council, and moves toward enculturation and the use of the vernacular in the liturgy.

Msgr. Raymond East, director of the Office of Black Catholics for the Archdiocese of Washington, traces the birth of Catholic gospel music to Father Clarence Joseph Rivers, an African-American priest who applied the principles he saw in the blossoming liturgical folk music scene of 40-plus years ago to his own experience.

"He was the first one to start publishing national resources, 'chronologuing' African-American culture and music and doing it from a scholarly basis," Msgr. East said.

"What was basically unique about Father Clarence Rivers was that he was a composer and a musician. One of the first compositions I heard was his 'Mass of Brotherhood,'" the priest said.

"He had composed that, and it was a beautiful jazzlike liturgy, with all parts of the Mass (sung)," he said.

It took time to gain acceptance — Msgr. East said pastors of that time often declared that Catholic gospel music "wasn't traditional enough" or "not Christian" — but it started gaining footholds in large U.S. cities with large African-American populations.

Today, most parishes with a sizable African-American population are likely to have a gospel choir, although most people who hear and lead the groups say Catholic gospel music sounds different from its Protestant counterparts.

"Our theological beliefs are different. Roman Catholic use of the Lectionary and liturgical seasons maps out a specific plan that is cyclical in nature. Our emphasis on feast days and solemnities is a different experience from that of our Protestant sisters and brothers," said Meyer Chambers.

Chambers is director of the Archdiocese of Boston Black Catholic Choir and co-chair of the special interest section for African-American musicians in the National Association of Pastoral Musicians.

"(Pope) Pius X said that music is the handmaid of the liturgy. In that role music has a place that serves several different needs," Chambers said.

"Sometimes it is meant to accompany the ritual action. Sometimes it is meant to proclaim the psalm. Sometimes it is meant to stand alone," he said.

"While a number of choral functions overlap between Catholic and Protestant choirs, I think it's more accurate to say that their primary functions are different," said Chambers.

Conversion music

In some cases, because of a lack of Catholics skilled in gospel music, Protestants assume the roles of choir director and musicians.

"We embrace those people without training them in liturgy, so you end up with some odd musical selections at odd, inappropriate times," said Kevin Johnson, director of music at Our Lady of Lourdes Church in Atlanta and at Spelman College, a historically black college in Atlanta.

But there are plenty of instances, according to Msgr. East, in which Protestants hired for liturgical ministry in Catholic parishes join the church.

"After they played in the Catholic Church for years ... after they witnessed the RCIA (Rite of Christian Initiation of Adults) — another area that makes black Catholic gospel unique is the music for the rite, there was no regular Protestant gospel music for the rite — after you do (Easter) vigil after vigil and the rites, you start thinking, 'Maybe this Catholic thing is all right,'" Msgr. East said.

Rawn Harbor is one of them, although he says he considers himself "an exception, not the rule."

In 1979, after eight years of doing gospel music in Catholic churches, "I decided, 'I'm here every Sunday, every week, because I'm teaching in the Catholic school. Why not become Catholic?'"

Msgr. East said Catholic gospel music has served to build bridges between African-American Catholics and their Protestant counterparts, as well as serve as a tool for evangelization.

Dedicated directors

Marjorie Gabriel-Burrow, director of the gospel choir for St. Augustine-

St. Monica Church in Detroit and a participant in the Metro Catholic Gospel Choir, which is celebrating its 25th anniversary this year, confessed that being the director is hard work.

"It's not easy dealing with choirs," said Gabriel-Burrow, 53, a lifelong Catholic whose pastor sent her to all sorts of workshops and conferences to learn more about liturgy.

She eventually co-edited the "Lead Me, Guide Me" hymnal, a near-mandatory resource for African-American Catholics for the past 21 years.

Chambers says he has gotten flak for accepting whites into his choirs. "My response has been simple: one faith, one church, one baptism. For the most part, what affects group dynamics is the personality of the individual," he said.

"One cannot do an authentic version of a gospel song and not expect some reaction to it which elongates that piece of music, and the reaction is longer than what is expected by liturgical classicists as normal," Harbor said.

Gabriel-Burrow likes to feature works by African-American composers because, she said, "if I don't do it, I don't know who else will."

Still, she added, "I do a mixture of music. I also do music that is sometimes traditional, I will do something that is by the (St. Louis) Jesuits. I will do something that is old, or ancient. It depends on what fits for the sermons of that day."

Low-budget film creates stir among Catholic marriage advocates

ROGERS, Ark. (CNS) — The film "Fireproof" is causing a stir in Catholic marriage advocacy groups around the country. The movie has become a hit around the country, grossing $21.5 million, more than 40 times its budget.

"Fireproof" tells the story of a firefighter and his struggles to save his marriage. A book, "The Love Dare," which was originally a plot device in the film, was a No. 1 best-seller on The New York Times' paperback advice books list.

The Rev. Michael Catt is senior pastor at Sherwood Baptist Church in Albany, Ga., and executive producer of the film.

"I think anything that can impact marriages is a positive thing," he said. "If we can save a million marriages this year, the ripple effect on children who will not be from broken homes, who will not be abused, who will not be growing up in homes where Mom and Dad are yelling and screaming, that will have an effect on our culture — it will have an effect on our churches."

On a related "Fireproof" Web site are links to Catholic marriage resources such as the Archdiocese of Chicago Family Ministries, Retrouvaille, the National Association of Catholic Family Life Ministers and the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops' National Pastoral Initiative for Marriage.

Deacon Jack Weisenhorn of St. Michael Church in Gastonia is a founder and board member of First Things First of Gaston County, a nonprofit organization working to reduce divorces in the county. He helped promote the film's message by bringing couples — and firefighters — to a free screening in Gastonia in early October, compliments of the church and pastor, Father Roger Arnsparger.

Faithfully departed

All Souls Day a time to remember, honor those who are gone

On Nov. 2, we celebrate the feast of All Souls, a day the Catholic Church has reserved for those who have gone before us — the faithfully departed. It is an excellent opportunity for us to pause and reflect on our lives in the light of our deceased relatives and friends. This is the best way we can honor their memories.

There are two people who are special to me on this day of remembrance. When they were alive, they were always praying, preached by example and were certainly ready to die when they were called by God.

One was a monk and great friend of mine. The other one was my older sister. The monk died suddenly at age 31. My sister died slowly and painfully of breast cancer at age 64.

Even though their states of life and cultural upbringings were different, there were common threads in the spirituality of my friend, Brother Anthony, and my sister, Vicky.

Brother Anthony lived his religious vocation as a Benedictine monk in Latrobe, Pa. He had a joyful disposition, but didn't have any unspoken thoughts.

Although he had only been a monk for less than two years, he wasn't afraid to call other "brothers" — religious or seminarians — to correction. This made him very unpopular in his community, but he always said, "I'd rather tell the truth in charity than be popular."

My sister never married and lived her single vocation in Panama City, Panama. Vicky struggled with mental illness most of her adult life, and she became my mother's companion for close to 20 years after my dad died in 1988.

Both my sister and Brother Anthony had a very Catholic spirituality, and if you didn't know them well enough, you could almost say they wore their Catholicism on their sleeves. Both of them loved to pray the rosary, and both went to daily Mass.

Vicky had a great devotion to the Sacred Heart of Jesus and used to call herself "Victoria de Dios" (Victory of God). Brother Anthony loved the eucharistic Jesus and made daily holy hours.

When my sister died in March 2006, she had already embraced her long suffering of almost two years and knew that a great crown was waiting for her on the other side. Vicky was truly a beacon of God's light to those around her, from the terminally-ill to the cancer-free.

Brother Anthony loved to wear his Benedictine habit — he recognized it as a sign of our baptismal consecration to Jesus Christ.

In the eyes of those around him, including me, Brother Anthony was a healthy man. We used to run three to four miles regularly and he was the fittest monk I've ever known.

Yet one Wednesday evening in October 2000, during his religious community's weekly meeting while discussing the topic of simplicity, he stood up and quoted Pope John Paul II, saying, "The Holy Father said that we should wear our habits always as a sign of simplicity."

Then he sat down and had a heart aneurysm. He died instantaneously, fitting for a man who believed "we have to be ready to pray, preach and die at all times."

Brother Anthony and Vicky were beautiful souls, and I feel blessed that I was able to share my life with them. In times of trouble, I often reflect on their lives to keep me centered in Christ.

I am sure there are loved ones in your life that are now gone, but not forgotten. Renew the meaning to All Souls Day this coming Sunday, Nov. 2, and honor their memories by being ready to pray, preach and die at any time.

Eternal rest grant unto them O Lord, and let perpetual light shine unto them. And may the souls of the faithfully departed, through the mercy of God, rest in peace. Amen.

The most precious of angels

Examining choice, from a victim's point of view

Editor's note: A version of this column first ran Oct. 6, 2006.

"Hello again," said the Child with a smile.

"Hello, little one," said the Voice. "My, you've gotten a lot bigger since I saw you last."

"I can suck my thumb now," beamed the Child. "See?"

"My, that's wonderful," said the Voice.

"I hear other voices," said the Child, "but I don't recognize them."

"You hear your mother talking with the doctor," said the Voice. "They are talking about you."

"My mother doesn't speak to me much anymore," sighed the Child. "I'm glad you visit with me. It's always brighter when you do. Sir, are you my father?"

"I am not your biological father, but I am your heavenly father," replied the Voice. "And I am always with you."

"Who is that man in the corner, the man with the horns?" asked the Child. "He scares me."

"Do not worry about him."

"You seem sad today, Father," said the Child. "What's the matter?"

"I'm sorry, little one," said the Voice. "I so looked forward to seeing you born, to watching you grow up. You were going to live near the water and break a national swimming record. You were going to dance with a boy at your prom, fall in love and marry him. You were going to raise precious children of your own. You were going to work with sick people and help them feel better. But now ... that is not going to happen."

"Why not?" asked the Child.

"Because, little one, your mother made a choice."

"I don't understand," said the Child. "I want to be born. I want to grow up and do all those things."

"I know you do. And you would have been amazing at them."

"Why is my mother doing this?" asked the Child. "Does she not love me?"

"She does not know you," replied the Voice. "She has been corrupted by the lies of that man with the horns. He has won another victory today."

"What is happening, Father?" asked the Child. "I don't feel well. Something is wrong."

"Look at me, little one. Focus on me. Do you hear the music?"

"Yes, I hear it."

"That is the chorus of my kingdom, where my angels sing and dance on the clouds," said the Voice. "Listen to the music."

"I'm trying, but I feel pain! It hurts Father!" cried the Child. "Am I dying? I don't want to die! I want to be born! I want to grow up! Please, Father!"

"I am sorry, little one," said the Voice. "I am so sorry."

"Father ... don't leave me"

"Never."

Darkness overcame the Child. The chorus of heaven fell silent. And the man with the horns smiled.

"What ... what happened?" asked the Child.

"Hello again, little one," said the Voice.

The Child looked around. "I can hear the music again! Is that where we are going?"

"Yes. I am taking you to my kingdom."

"I can see it! It's so beautiful! And I can see your angels dancing on the clouds!" said the Child.

"They are celebrating to welcome you home," said the Voice.

The Child paused, looking back. "I am going to miss her — my mother."

"You will see her again one day," said the Voice.

"Father, is there any way I can help her, and other mothers, to make the right choice?"

"That's a big task," said the Voice. "Let's work on that together."

The Child beamed. "Thank you, Father. But first — I want to dance on the clouds with the angels!"

"Of course, little one, but," said the Voice, holding out his hand, "may I have the first dance?"

Vote your true conscience

What would God want us to do in this situation?

When I hear all the promises made by the political candidates, promises Americans will never be able to pay for, wonder if we are not being charmed out of our common sense.

Our dilemma reminds me of the story about a man who died and stood before St. Peter.

Peter said, "You now have a final choice, you can choose heaven or hell. It's up to you."

"Take this elevator and go down to hell; see if you like it. Then compare it to heaven before you make your choice."

The man was eager to see what hell was like, but to his surprise, when the elevator door to hell opened he saw a wonderful party going on with men and women drinking and dancing and having good time. He also saw dozens of his friends.

He went back to St. Peter, who next opened the door to heaven for him to glimpse. He saw a green field with a few people sitting around, apparently doing nothing. It seemed very boring.

Finally Peter said, "Now you must choose."

The man hesitated at first, and then said, "I saw many of my friends in hell having a good time. I think I'd like to be with them."

In a flash he was sent down to hell. But when the elevator opened, to his shock and horror, all he saw was a filthy garbage dump with people dressed in rags digging for food.

He protested, saying, "This isn't the place I was first shown!"

But Satan laughed at him, saying, "Yesterday we were campaigning for your vote; today you see reality."

Universal health care will cost over a trillion dollars and a government grant for the college education of every student will cost billions more. Buying up mortgages of those in or near default will add more to the bill.

All this is supposed to cost U.S. taxpayers nothing; in fact, we are told we will get a tax cut. You do the math.

What will we see in January when reality settles in?

I see millions of Christians disregarding the abortion issue as they make up their minds. It's true, elections are not about one issue, but they are supposed to be about truth and integrity.

Vote for whomever you want, but be aware that you may be being duped.

I think the stakes are extremely high in this election. If you are in doubt about who to vote for, ask yourself, "What would God want me to do in this situation?"

Spirituality for Today

FATHER JOHN CATOIR
CNS COLUMNIST

God gives everyone the freedom to accept or reject Jesus Christ as Lord. Accepting him is the beginning of wisdom. Christians through the ages know that Jesus wants us to take his words seriously.

Remember too that belief in Jesus is primarily an act of the will. We accept him as our personal savior, doing whatever he tells us.

The believer also trusts that Jesus is telling the truth. His authority assures us that there is a supernatural order, which we are to make visible in this world.

The Bible is not a collection of opinions; it is a spiritual storehouse of ancient wisdom. When interpreted correctly, the Bible teaches us who we are, why we are here and where we are going.

In this election, I recommend that you vote for the truth as you see it. In the process, accept Jesus as the magnificent centerpiece of divine revelation.

Jesus calls us to "love one another" (Jn 13:34), especially the weakest among us.

Jesus' death on cross expresses power of God's love, pope says

The Pope Speaks

POPE BENEDICT XVI

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — God's Son dying on the cross may appear to signal a scandalous victory of pain and death but, for Christians, the cross expresses "the power of God's limitless love," Pope Benedict XVI said.

During his Oct. 29 general audience in St. Peter's Square, Pope Benedict spoke about St. Paul's teachings on the meaning of the cross.

After St. Paul's conversion, the apostle realized Jesus had died and risen for him and for every person in the world, the pope said. Therefore, the cross revealed the power of God's merciful and saving love that he freely gives to all people, he said.

Once a sinner and persecutor of Christians, St. Paul saw that his new life and salvation were a gift, a grace from God "that stemmed from the death of Christ and not from his own merits" or virtuous acts, the pope said.

Rather than death or failure, the cross signifies "salvation given to every creature," he said.

Here is the text of the pope's audience remarks in English.

Dear Brothers and Sisters,

In our continuing catechesis on St. Paul, we now consider the central place of the cross of Jesus Christ in his preaching.

Paul's encounter with the glorified Lord on the way to Damascus convinced him that Jesus had died and risen for him and for all. The mystery of the cross showed him the power of God's merciful and saving love.

As Paul told the Corinthians, he came not to preach in lofty words or wisdom, but to proclaim "Jesus Christ, and him crucified" (cf. I Cor 2:2).

The cross, which seems a stumbling block to Jews and folly to Gentiles, is the revelation of God's wisdom and strength. As the supreme sign of God's love for sinful humanity, the cross invites us to that true wisdom which accepts the free gift of God's merciful and saving love.

On the cross, Christ gave himself up for our sins (cf. Gal 1:4), becoming a sacrifice of atonement in his own blood (cf. Rom 3:25).

For Paul, faith in the crucified Lord thus calls us to crucify our own flesh with its desires, in order to share in Christ's death and resurrection (cf. Gal 5:24).

In accepting the weakness of the cross, we experience the power of God's love for us.

An immigration story — before the U.S. built a wall on its border with Mexico

U.S. bishops advocate reform for dignity, rights of immigrants

This incident happened years ago, when immigration matters were all handled by the Immigration and Naturalization Services (now divided into other agencies in the Department of Homeland Security).

It was before we started building a wall on our border with Mexico. It was before our own economic downturn and the United States started slowing migration.

My brother was an executive in the meatpacking industry, and he told me about an INS raid on another company's plant. It was in a small town and many undocumented workers were found working inside the plant.

The workers without papers were ceremoniously loaded onto buses and right then and there hauled several hundred miles from the Midwest across the Mexican border and deposited in our southern neighbor's territory.

It wasn't a particularly unusual occurrence for those days.

What was interesting to my brother was the story of one particular woman who was loaded onto the bus and hauled away. Within a week, she was back in that same small Midwestern town.

Having slipped across the border back into the United States, she traveled the way through several states to the place she had left. Why? Because when they dragged her onto the bus, she left a child behind in the town. She had come back to reclaim him.

That story may leave you with several thoughts, depending on your views of immigration.

The story reminded me of mothers everywhere. It resonated with me, a mom who would fight tooth and nail if I was torn from one of my babes. I felt tremendous empathy for that woman and anger at a system that could be so cruel and so unjust.

Unjust? But wasn't she breaking the law? Yes, but so was the company that profited from the hard work of those eager employees, those hungry folk who are willing to work for a little less than the average American so that they can get the foothold we take for granted.

In our current economic turmoil, Americans don't want to see the "fat cats" on Wall Street making a fortune after turning the system upside down. Likewise, I want to see employers held accountable for breaking the law.

Our borders aren't so porous anymore. We have more enforcement and rather than trying to solve the economic problems on both sides of the borders, we're building a fence to separate us from our southern sisters and brothers.

And even though immigration hasn't been a big issue thus far in the presidential campaign, it's still an issue, and because so many immigrants are Catholics, it should be a special concern of ours.

The U.S. bishops have advocated reform that will provide for broad-based, earned legalization for undocumented persons.

They've asked for reform of our family-based immigration system to reunite folks with loved ones in the United States.

They've encouraged reform of the system to provide legal pathways for migrants to work in a safe environment, for dignity for laborers and for due process protections for immigrants.

They've urged the U.S. government to work with other governments to address the conditions that compel people to migrate.

In 1986 Pope John Paul II said this: "The church repeats with insistence that ... the protection of families, and particularly of those burdened by further difficulties of being migrants and refugees, constitutes an indispensable priority. ... 'What God has joined together, let no one separate' sounds like an implicit condemnation for a society that grants economic advantage to the detriment of moral values."

Options for Dismissal

The Vatican has approved three new options for the dismissal at Mass. A presider may choose among these endings:

- 1 "The Mass is ended, go in peace."
- 2 "Go and announce the Gospel of the Lord."
- 3 "Go in peace, glorifying the Lord by your life."
- 4 "Go in peace."

New dismissal options at Mass meant to help people live the Gospel

U.S. Catholics unlikely to hear new forms until 2012 or later

BY DENNIS SADOWSKI
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

WASHINGTON — The new options for dismissal at Mass are meant to help worshippers connect the liturgy with the missionary call of the rest of their lives, explained a liturgist with the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops in Washington.

Chosen by Pope Benedict XVI himself, the closings were created to help the faithful see that the "transformation that takes place in the Eucharist ... ultimately helps to transform us as those who receive the Eucharist," said Father Richard Hilgartner, associate director of the Secretariat of Divine Worship.

However, U.S. Catholics are unlikely to hear the new forms of dismissal at Mass until 2012 or later, when the new English translation of the Roman Missal is introduced.

Father Hilgartner said the new options are meant to reflect "several transformations" that occur during the Mass.

"The bread and wine become the body and blood of Jesus, and as the faithful share in the body and blood of Christ the prayer is that we become more the body of Christ, which has to do with how we live," he said.

The options were outlined by Cardinal Francis Arinze of the Congregation for Divine Worship and the Sacraments at the Vatican, in an interview published in the Oct. 17 issue of L'Osservatore Romano, the Vatican newspaper.

Along with "Ite, missa est," the Latin phrase now translated as "The Mass is ended, go in peace," he said the new options are:

— "Ite ad Evangelium Domini annuntiandum" (Go and announce the Gospel of the Lord).

— "Ite in pace, glorificando vitam vestram Dominum" (Go in peace, glorifying the Lord by your life).

— "Ite in pace" (Go in peace).

"It's our understanding that the Holy Father had a desire to find ways to express more clearly the connection between what's celebrated in the liturgy and how the faithful live their lives beyond liturgy, that movement from the altar to the world," Father Hilgartner said in an interview with Catholic News Service.

The closing options will be included in the new English-language translation of the main constant parts of the Mass, which was approved, or given "recognitio," by the Vatican in July.

The new dismissals will be part of the revised Roman Missal, which will include modified interpretations of many of the common acclamations and prayers.

The U.S. bishops will take up the second of the 10 sections into which the Roman Missal has been divided at their fall general meeting Nov. 10-13 in Baltimore.

The 700-page section failed to receive the necessary two-thirds majority for approval after several long discussions during the bishops' June meeting and subsequent mail ballot.

The second section governs the translation of proper prayers for Sunday and feast days during the liturgical year.

Father Hilgartner said if the process stays on schedule the bishops are expected to approve all 10 sections by the end of 2010. Each section also must be confirmed by the Vatican.

Once approved, he said, it will likely be another year before the changes make their way into the liturgy in order for the necessary catechesis to take place in dioceses and the revised missals to be printed and distributed.

Mass dismissals among suggestions being considered at Vatican

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — The Vatican has prepared three alternative endings for the priest's words of dismissal at Mass, to emphasize the missionary spirit of the liturgy.

Pope Benedict XVI personally chose the three options from suggestions presented to him after a two-year study, said Cardinal Francis Arinze, head of the Congregation for Divine Worship and the Sacraments. The congregation still was studying another suggestion made during the 2005 Synod of Bishops, that of moving the sign of peace to a different part of the Mass.

In 2005, the pope said the sign of peace had great value, but should be done with "restraint" so that it does not become a distraction during Mass. He asked for the study on moving the sign of peace from a moment just before Communion to another time in the liturgy.

Cardinal Arinze said that, after consultation, the congregation had written to bishops' conferences asking their preference between leaving the sign of peace where it is now and moving it to an earlier moment, after the prayer of the faithful. Responses were expected to be in by the end of October, and the question would then be presented to the pope for a final decision.

Cardinal Arinze said a third suggestion from the 2005 synod, "eucharistic compendium," also has made progress and is near publication. It would include doctrinal notes on the Mass, as well as prayer texts, passages of papal liturgical teachings, canon law tracts and other explanatory material. He emphasized that the compendium would propose ideas, not impose them.

A fourth project of the working congregation, working together with Vatican congregations for doctrine and clergy, was the drawing up of a list of homily themes that correspond to Sunday scriptural readings and to the church's doctrinal teachings.

"This is not a matter of modifying homilies, but general indications which, for each theme, elements are furnished to be able to develop the theme," he said.

Colossians 1: 28

October 2008

Dear Brothers and Sisters in Christ:

"It is Christ Whom We Proclaim" is an appropriate theme for this year's annual report. The words were written by St. Paul in Colossians. Our Holy Father, Pope Benedict XVI, has proclaimed this the Pauline year to mark the 2,000th anniversary of the birth of St. Paul. With all of that in mind, I am pleased to present to you the annual report of the Diocese of Charlotte for the year ending June 30, 2008.

This report will show you that, once again, the Diocese of Charlotte is sound — both spiritually and financially. I would like to thank the people of God in western North Carolina, who are committed to the diocese through prayer, service and ongoing financial support. It is through this generosity and dedication that we continue to proclaim Christ.

Proclaiming Christ is evident in our diocese every day. Our fourth Eucharistic Congress took place in early October. I am grateful to the thousands of people who processed in prayer through the streets of uptown Charlotte with the Eucharist, the source and summit of Catholic life.

Our continued success is aided by prayer and the commitment and hard work of the many priests, deacons and religious who serve the diocese in our 92 parishes and missions, our schools and our social service agencies. During this past year I had the honor of ordaining two men to the priesthood. Father Brad Jones and Father Tri Vinh Truong will guide the faithful and celebrate the sacraments for many years to come.

Faith formation programs throughout the 46 counties of our diocese continue to grow. Approximately 42,500 children and adults participate in parish-based religious education programs. In addition, our 18 diocesan and parish-based schools provide kindergarten through 12th-grade instruction for 7,829 children. In one of those schools, St. Ann in Charlotte, a new program meets the needs of children with special learning needs in grades two-five. It is very gratifying to know that these children will receive their education in a Christ-centered setting.

The people of Catholic Social Services continue to proclaim Christ through action as they provide caring help to thousands of individuals and families in need. In particular, during the past year the international adoption services of CSS received Hague accreditation. This certification means that CSS continues to conform to the highest international standards to ensure that inter-country adoptions are in the best interests of children.

With the blessing of our Lord we will continue to proclaim Christ each day as we work together to build up the Kingdom of God in our diocese. I know we can accomplish this with the blessing of your prayers and your continued financial support. Thank you for generosity, in your weekly offertory giving and the Diocesan Support Appeal as well as the many other needs that are met through your kindness.

Sincerely yours in Christ,

+ Peter J. Jugis

Vocations, Clergy, Religious Life

Proclaiming Christ through ministry and vocation

On June 7, 2008, two men formally dedicated their lives to proclaiming Christ by answering his call to serve as priests. Father Brandon Jones and Father Tri Vinh Truong were ordained to the priesthood by Bishop Peter J. Jugis at St. Vincent de Paul Church in Charlotte.

"Your being is changed by this powerful grace, making you a sacrament of Christ the high priest, capable of acting in the person of Christ," Bishop Jugis told them during the ordination Mass.

That day, the new priests each received the Gospel of Christ from the bishop and promised to boldly proclaim it both in word and deed.

"By your teaching, sanctifying and shepherding in the name of Christ, the Lord will work through your ministry to produce the fruit of salvation in the people you serve — the fruit which remains unto eternal life," said Bishop Jugis.

With the ordination of Fathers Jones and Truong, a total of 38 men have been ordained to the priesthood in the Diocese of Charlotte over the past decade.

Currently, 78 diocesan priests and 52 religious order priests proclaim Christ to the faithful of the diocese's parishes and missions. Alongside of them are many of the 31 retired priests who generously still minister to others in churches, schools, prisons, hospitals and nursing homes.

"I think the most enriching ministry of the priesthood is the ministry to the sick and suffering — working with the people especially when suffering by (approaching) death," said Father Joseph Kelleher, a retired diocesan priest who celebrated 55 years as a priest in June 2008.

The diocese's 108 permanent deacons help proclaim the message of Christ to people from all walks of life in churches and agencies, airport and hospital chapels, and prisons throughout western North Carolina.

"By exercising his ministry with love, patience and understanding, the deacon shows a heart that has been given over to the Lord," said Bishop Jugis, who celebrated the permanent deacons' annual recommitment Mass at St. Patrick Cathedral in Charlotte March 1, 2008.

Currently, there are 113 women religious representing 19 orders proclaiming the Gospel of Christ in churches, schools, hospitals and ministries throughout the Diocese of Charlotte.

One approach in the diocese to fulfill the privileged responsibility of proclaiming Christ is through the “Why Catholic?” program, which was introduced in the Diocese of Charlotte in 2007.

“Why Catholic?” is a program of RENEW International, a Roman Catholic organization that fosters spiritual renewal, evangelization and the transformation of the world through parish-based small Christian communities.

“The ‘Why Catholic?’ program will help all of us understand better the teachings of our Catholic faith,” said Bishop Jugis.

“Catechesis is tied to evangelization. If we are strongly rooted in our faith, then we will be more effective in bringing Christ’s teachings into the public arena where we can have an impact on the important moral issues facing society,” said the bishop, who has endorsed the program in the diocese.

“On numerous occasions in parish work, I have encountered adults who feel inadequately prepared to defend or discuss their faith,” said Father John Putnam, judicial vicar of the diocese and pastor of Sacred Heart Church in Salisbury.

“‘Why Catholic?’ actually provides a means to begin addressing the problem. Anything that we pastors can do to assist our people to embrace their faith more completely is certainly worth exploring,” he said.

And assisting and embracing all people in need, especially those with critical human needs, with the love of Christ is core to Catholic Social Services’ outreach.

Catholic Social Services

Proclaiming Christ by serving people in need

The New Testament reveals how Jesus created a community that gathers for the Eucharist and then disperses to love all and care for those in need. In the 21st century, Pope Benedict XVI writes in his first encyclical "Deus Caritas Est" ("God is Love") that "as a community, the church must practice love. Love thus needs to be organized if it is to be an ordered service to the community."

Catholic Social Services (CSS) of the Diocese of Charlotte is such an organized charity that touches the lives of many people, both Catholic and non-Catholic, in and beyond western North Carolina. Last year, more than 16,300 people utilized CSS's broad range of services — marriage preparation courses and natural family planning instruction; pregnancy support; elder ministry; counseling, adoption and immigration services; refugee resettlement; burial assistance; and peer support groups for youths.

When, through CSS, food is provided to the hungry, assistance is rendered to individuals in crisis and loving families are matched with adoptive children, it is truly Christ's love that is proclaimed.

Michael and Jennifer Kellam of Waxhaw are able to share that love with Andrew, whom they adopted from a Russian orphanage through CSS's international adoption program.

In 2007, CSS was among the first eight agencies worldwide to be accredited by the Russian Federation, and is the only Catholic agency in the United States with a direct placement program in Russia. CSS staff assist adoptive parents in all phases of the process.

"We felt free to call the staff anytime. There was always someone available to talk with us," said Jennifer Kellam. "CSS was very upfront and efficient and made the whole process as smooth as possible."

Professional, knowledgeable and compassionate are the qualities that allow those who work in CSS, and all the ministries of the Diocese of Charlotte, to proclaim Christ to those they serve.

Human Capital

Proclaiming Christ by working together

Just as priests, deacons and men and women religious in the Diocese of Charlotte proclaim Christ through their ministries, so too do the laity who serve throughout the diocese in various capacities — as teachers, catechists, counselors, custodians and musicians.

In their deeds and words, the many dedicated employees and volunteers in the Diocese of Charlotte represent Christ's work on earth through their ministries in churches, schools and agencies. They bring to their work a multitude of backgrounds, cultures, experiences and talents.

In support of these individuals, the Diocese of Charlotte has established policies and procedures that ensure compliance with diocesan regulations and state and federal employment laws. The diocesan Human Resources Office educates, advises and assists parishes, missions, schools and offices in all areas of personnel administration.

The employee benefit programs offered by the diocese provide protection and support for employees and their families.

The costs of employee benefit programs for all diocesan entities were as follows:

LONG TERM DISABILITY INSURANCE	$ 105,195	$ 96,651
HEALTH AND LIFE INSURANCE	$ 4,573,970	$ 3,505,099
LAY PENSION PLAN	$ 1,752,133	$ 1,913,642
403(B) PLAN CONTRIBUTIONS	$ 625,334	$ 580,388

Through the continuing, dedicated efforts of all who serve and minister within the diocese, Christ's message will continue to be proclaimed in and beyond western North Carolina.

And because of the continuing commitment and generosity of the faithful in the diocese, the Catholic Church in North Carolina will continue to flourish and prosper long into the future.

The Foundation

Proclaiming Christ by providing for the future

People across the diocese are helping provide for the future needs of the Catholic Church they love. Through endowments with the Foundation for the Roman Catholic Diocese of Charlotte, these generous parishioners are helping provide long-term financial stability for the church, its needs and mission of proclaiming Christ.

"It is a way of living out another aspect of stewardship that allows individuals to leave legacies to what they value in life," said Jim Kelley, director of the diocesan foundation and development office.

The foundation is a nonprofit organization established to provide endowments for the diocese and its churches, schools, agencies and organizations. Endowments are permanent funds that earn income over time. The original amount is not spent, but the income can be used in a manner stipulated in the person's estate plan or in an endowment agreement.

NUMBER OF ACTIVE EMPLOYEES:

FULL-TIME: 920

PART-TIME: 1,322

Established in 1994 with two endowments, the foundation currently has 168 endowments, including 13 endowments established this past fiscal year. Principal additions to endowments for the year totaled $955,314; distributions for the year totaled $422,110.

Income from four of these endowments provided $60,200 in 22 separate grants awarded by the foundation to help support programs for the poor, minority communities and evangelical initiatives. Thirteen of these grants funded parish programs supporting these initiatives. The remaining nine grants funded CSS programs as well as other outreach programs in the diocese also in support of these initiatives.

Two of the newly-created endowments were established through bequests from individuals who chose to include the church in their final estate plans.

One of these endowments is the St. Joseph Endowment Fund for Needy Parishes. Established by a diocesan priest, the endowment directly benefits needy parishes in the diocese. As with all the endowments, anyone can add to this particular fund with a gift of any size.

“Any kind of gift, when multiplied by many people or parishioners, will make the school very strong,” said Catherine Lassiter, who, with her husband Reynolds, established an endowment for St. Leo the Great School in Winston-Salem, where their children attend.

Through their generosity, the Lassiters are among the 850 members of the diocesan Catholic Heritage Society — those who plan to remember the church in their estate.

“We are grateful for these individuals from all walks of life who are ensuring the future of the church and our theme of ‘It is Christ Whom We Proclaim,’” said Kelley.

Endowments are not the only way the faithful help shape the future of the Catholic Church in western North Carolina. Through support of the Diocesan Support Appeal, parishioners are helping proclaim Christ today around the diocese.

Diocesan Support Appeal

Proclaiming Christ by providing for today

The 2007 Diocesan Support Appeal (DSA), which was themed “Answer the Call,” was supported by more than 19,000 households who generously responded to Christ’s call to be his disciples. The appeal raised more than $4,250,000 to help fund more than 50 ministries to better the lives of countless people.

“The DSA provides every Catholic ... with an opportunity to answer God’s call with ‘Here I am. Send me,’” said Bishop Jugis.

“We’re each called by Christ through our baptism to play some role in building the Kingdom of God,” said Barbara Gaddy, associate director of diocesan development.

“We’re each called to look beyond our own personal needs and the needs of our parishes to the big picture: how we minister to one another here in the Diocese of Charlotte,” she said.

The ministries funded by the DSA fulfill the needs of others throughout the Diocese of Charlotte by feeding the hungry, providing education, evangelizing and in many other ways.

DSA funding of diocesan ministries during the past fiscal year was as follows:

			DSA FUNDRAISING COSTS	$ 156,320	$ 151,170

Of the amount collected, $530,534.06 was distributed to 45 parishes, representing funds collected that exceeded parish goals. Forty-four parishes fell short of their goal and contributed a total of $186,386.11 to the DSA from parish funds.

Hundreds of people — parish catechists, youth ministers, Hispanic coordinators, counselors, social workers, seminarians, diaconate candidates and parish lay leaders — proclaim Christ’s message to our brothers and sisters in faith thanks to contributions to the DSA.

Special Collections

Proclaiming Christ by providing for special needs

Christ's message was meant to be shared and heard by all. Special collections give Catholics in western North Carolina the opportunity to boldly proclaim this message and share in the missionary work of the Catholic Church throughout this country and the rest of the world.

Special collections benefited Catholic Relief Services, the Holy Land, the Catholic Church in Latin America and Central and Eastern Europe, Peter's Pence, Catholic University of America, the Catholic Communications Campaign, the Society for the Propagation of the Faith, the United States Mission Appeal, the Catholic Home Missions Appeal, the Catholic Campaign for Human Development and religious retirement. The following presents the funds raised through the collections to help proclaim Christ through faith and action beyond the borders of the diocese.

REPORT FROM CHIEF FINANCIAL OFFICER

I am pleased to report that the Roman Catholic Diocese of Charlotte remains financially healthy due to the generosity of the people of this diocese. The combined financial statements are presented on the following pages, and include all significant entities of the diocese except for parishes (and parish and inter-parochial schools), which report separately to their parishioners.

The diocese completed the year ended June 30, 2008 with an increase in net assets totaling $1,813,969, which includes a $90,295 charge to net assets relating to our pension plans' most recent actuarial valuations. Revenues exceeded expenses by $1,904,264, consisting of:

- $544,091 increase in endowment funds and perpetual trust funds, which are permanent in nature;
- $432,994 decrease in net assets whose use is restricted by donor imposed stipulations, which is primarily attributable to investment losses on endowment funds; and
- $1,793,167 increase in unrestricted net assets. Included in this increase are one-time bequests totaling $1,173,871, investment losses of $425,079 and market adjustments relating to two interest-rate swap agreements (that provide a fixed rate of interest on a majority of diocesan long-term debt) of -$796,228. Also included is the unrestricted net activity of diocesan schools, which, excluding the change in market value of an interest-rate swap agreement and investment income, totaled $3,050,603.

Cash flow resulting from unrestricted activities provides funds needed for the acquisition of property, plant and equipment, and for repayment of long-term debt. At June 30, 2008, the diocese had outstanding long-term debt totaling $26,940,000.

The pie charts below depict the major sources of revenues and summarize expenditures for the fiscal year just ended. Revenues for the year totaled $62,193,276. Support of diocesan programs and ministries — i.e., program expenses — totaled $38,659,516, representing 64 percent of total expenditures. The remaining expenditures relate to supporting activities — i.e., administrative and fundraising expenses — that totaled $21,629,496, of which 14 percent represents depreciation and amortization expense ($3,121,471). A further breakout of these expenses by functional area is presented within the Statement of Activities contained on page 16.

The diocesan Finance Office remains committed to the highest standards of fiscal integrity and accountability. To this end, the diocese has enumerated principles for strong financial governance, which can be found on the diocesan Web site. It is the responsibility of the diocesan Finance Office to ensure that accounting policies and procedures are being adhered to, and internal controls are in place and operating so as to safeguard church assets and ensure that all financial activity is accounted for properly. Financial oversight is provided by routine financial audits and the diocesan Finance Council, which is directly responsible to the bishop.

The combined financial statements of the Diocese of Charlotte for the years ended June 30, 2008 and 2007 are presented on the following pages for your review. The integrity of these statements and the integrity of the underlying financial systems are the responsibility of the diocese. The public accounting firm of Deloitte and Touché, LLP was engaged to perform an independent audit of these financial statements. Their audit report is also included in the financial report that follows.

USES OF OUR RESOURCES

INDEPENDENT AUDITORS' REPORT

To the Most Reverend Peter J. Jugis, Bishop of Charlotte:

We have audited the accompanying combined statements of financial position of The Roman Catholic Diocese of Charlotte (the "Diocese") as of June 30, 2008 and 2007, and the related combined statements of activities and cash flows for the years then ended. These combined financial statements are the responsibility of Diocesan management. Our responsibility is to express an opinion on these combined financial statements based on our audits.

We conducted our audits in accordance with auditing standards generally accepted in the United States of America. Those standards require that we plan and perform the audit to obtain reasonable assurance about whether the combined financial statements are free of material misstatement. An audit includes consideration of internal control over financial reporting as a basis for designing audit procedures that are appropriate in the circumstances, but not for the purpose of expressing an opinion on the effectiveness of the Diocese's internal control over financial reporting. Accordingly, we express no such opinion. An audit also includes examining, on a test basis, evidence supporting the amounts and disclosures in the financial statements, assessing the accounting principles used and significant estimates made by management, as well as evaluating the overall financial statement presentation. We believe that our audits provide a reasonable basis for our opinion.

In our opinion, such combined financial statements present fairly, in all material respects, the combined financial position of the Diocese as of June 30, 2008 and 2007, and the results of their operations and its cash flows for the years then ended in conformity with accounting principles generally accepted in the United States of America.

As discussed in Note 2 to the combined financial statements, as of June 30, 2007, the Diocese changed its method of accounting for defined benefit pension obligations and other postretirement benefit obligations to conform to Financial Accounting Standards Board (FASB) Statement No. 158, Employers' Accounting for Defined Benefit Pension and Other Postretirement Plans — An Amendment of FASB Statements No. 87, 88, 106, and 132R.

The Diocese comprises a geographic area of 20,470 square miles covering 46 counties ranging from the western North Carolina piedmont region to the North Carolina mountain region. The accompanying combined financial statements do not include the liabilities (including the Parish Notes discussed in Note 10), or activities of individual parishes and interparochial schools. These excluded activities are entities distinct from the offices and organizations included herein, which maintain separate accounts, and carry on their own programs.

The accompanying combined financial statements include the accounts of the following organizations which operate under the auspices of the Diocese:

Central Administration ("Central Administration"), which provides administrative and other services to parishes, schools, and agencies of the Diocese. Services include: coordination and support of educational programs; multicultural ministries; the vocations program; continuing formation of and support of retired priests; parish savings and investment program; employee benefit program; property/casualty insurance program; diocesan tri-union operation of the Catholic Conference Center and Cathedral Publishing, the publisher of the Catholic News & Herald.

CSS manages the operations of Catholic Legal Services, Inc., which was established to provide indigent legal services for the Hispanic community. During fiscal 2008 and 2007, there was minimal activity on the part of Catholic Legal Services.

Foundation of the Roman Catholic Diocese of Charlotte, Inc., which solicits, administers, and disburses funds through the creation of endowments for educational, religious, and charitable purposes for the benefit of the Diocese and its various parishes, schools, and agencies.

The Catholic Diocese of Charlotte Housing Corporation, whose mission is to create, maintain, promote, and operate housing facilities and provide accompanying services for seniors, individuals, and families with low incomes, and other vulnerable populations.

Activities of the above organizations have been combined by functional area in the accompanying combined statements of activities. All significant diocesan transactions have been eliminated in combination.

SUMMARY OF SIGNIFICANT ACCOUNTING AND REPORTING POLICIES

Level of Presentation — The accounts of the Diocese are maintained on the consolidated basis. The Diocese complies with Financial Accounting Standards Board (FASB) Statement No. 116, Accounting for Contributions Received and Contributions Made, and FASB Statement No. 117, Financial Statements of Not-for-Profit Organizations.

Assets managed by the Diocese on behalf of affiliated organizations are in accordance with FASB Statement No. 136, Transfers of Assets to a Not-for-Profit Organization or Charitable Trust that Raises or Holds Contributions for Others.

Estimates in the Preparation of Financial Statements — The preparation of financial statements in conformity with accounting principles generally accepted in the United States of America requires management to make estimates and assumptions that affect the reported amounts of assets and liabilities and disclosure of contingent assets and liabilities at the date of the financial statements and the reported amounts of revenue and expenses during the reporting period. Actual results could differ from those estimates.

Cash and Cash Equivalents — The Diocese considers all highly liquid instruments purchased with an original maturity of three months or less to be cash equivalents. The Diocese has designated $450,000 of cash and investments for property and liability self-insurance reserves as of June 30, 2008 and 2007.

Assets Held in Trust — Assets held in trust represent future beneficial interests of the Diocese under various trust arrangements. Amounts are recorded based on the actuarially determined present value of the future gift.

Investments — Investments are carried at market value. Market values are based on readily available market quotes.

Property and Equipment — Property and equipment is stated at cost, when purchased, and at estimated market value, when donated. Depreciation expense is determined by using the straight-line method over the estimated useful lives of the assets. At June 30, 2008 and 2007, the major classes of property and equipment represented are as follows:

The interest in St. Matthew Education Center shown above represents the total amount paid by MACS for the acquisition and construction of property and equipment in accordance with a joint-usage agreement with St. Matthew Catholic Church. It is being amortized over the useful lives of the assets in which MACS has an interest. The amortization is included in accumulated depreciation shown above.

Interest expense incurred that relates to the acquisition or construction of property and equipment is capitalized. No interest expense was capitalized in fiscal years 2008 and 2007.

Custodial Obligations — Custodial funds are managed by the Diocese, as agent, on behalf of the originating organization. These funds are not recorded as contributions or net assets of the Diocese but rather are included as assets and corresponding custodial obligations in the accompanying combined statements of financial position.

Net Assets — Diocesan net assets consist of the following:

Unrestricted — Unrestricted net assets consist of all resources of the Diocese which have no donor-imposed restrictions. The Diocese has designated $29,496,600 and $21,348,623 of unrestricted net assets as of June 30, 2008 and 2007, respectively, primarily for future expenses relating to DSA program agencies, the pastoral center, employee benefit programs, self-insured programs, retired clergy benefit programs, debt service, grant awards, and endowments.

Temporarily Restricted — Temporarily restricted net assets consist of contributions received whose use by the Diocese is limited by donor-imposed stipulations that expire by passage of time or can be fulfilled by actions of the Diocese. When a donor restriction expires, temporarily restricted net assets are reclassified to unrestricted net assets and reported in the accompanying combined statements of activities as net assets released from restrictions.

Permanently Restricted — Permanently restricted net assets consist of contributions received from donors whose use by the Diocese is limited permanently by donor-imposed stipulations.

School Tuition, Fees, and Parish Support — Tuition and related fees represent amounts paid by students' families, net of applied tuition assistance, and are recognized over the school year in which earned. Parish support of schools represents contributions made by the participating parishes of the Diocese. Amounts received in the current year for the following school year's tuition are recorded as unearned revenue in the accompanying combined statements of financial position.

Investment Income — Changes in the market value of securities are reflected as net realized/unrealized gains (losses) on investments in the accompanying combined statements of activities.

New Accounting Standard — In September 2006, the FASB issued FASB Statement No. 158, Employers' Accounting for Defined Benefit Pension and Other Postretirement Plan — An Amendment of FASB Statements No. 87, 88, 106 and 132R. FASB Statement No. 158 requires balance sheet recognition of the funded status of pension and postretirement benefit plans. Under FASB Statement No. 158, actuarial gains and losses, prior service costs or credits, and any remaining transition assets or obligations that have not been recognized under previous accounting standards must be recognized as a component of net assets until they are amortized as a component of net periodic benefit expense. Additionally, the measurement date (the date at which plan assets and the benefit obligation are measured) is required to be the Diocese's fiscal year-end, which is consistent with our current practice. FASB Statement No. 158 was effective for the Diocese for the year ended June 30, 2007. Based on the funded status of the Diocese's defined benefit pension plans as of June 30, 2007, the adoption of FASB Statement No. 158 caused a reduction in net assets of $5,956,600. Refer to Note 8 for additional details pertaining to the pension and postretirement plans.

Tax-Exempt Status — The Diocese is exempt from federal income tax under Section 501(c)(3) of the Internal Revenue Code. Accordingly, no provision for income taxes has been reflected in the accompanying combined financial statements.

3. PLEDGES AND OTHER RECEIVABLES

The DSA campaign begins in the fiscal year prior to the expenditure of funds by DSA program agencies. At June 30, 2008 and 2007, respectively, pledges receivable included $874,416 and $970,428 in DSA campaign related pledges that had not been collected.

The Diocese assesses parishes and affiliates to cover the costs of general administration, property and liability insurance, employee health insurance, employee retirement, and the Catholic News and Herald. Total assessments receivable at June 30, 2008 and 2007, were $168,588 and $58,586, respectively.

4. NOTES RECEIVABLE

The Diocese has $9,420,428 and $2,018,464 of notes receivable outstanding at June 30, 2008 and 2007, respectively, of which $9,346,974 and $2,001,472 were with parishes. These notes bear various interest rates.

5. ADVANCES TO PARISHES

The Diocese maintains a revolving loan fund, which was established primarily from resources provided by bequests stipulated for advances to small or needy parishes at no interest. Advances outstanding at June 30, 2008 and 2007, totaled $2,866,202 and $2,666,441, respectively. These advances are long-term in nature and are reflected, net of allowances, at their estimated present value of $2,194,337 and $2,201,792 in the accompanying combined statements of financial position at June 30, 2008 and 2007, respectively.

6. INVESTMENTS

The Diocese utilizes financial institutions to provide custodial and recordkeeping services, in addition to investment managers with full discretionary authority, subject to the Diocese's investment policies, to provide investment management services. Investments are carried at market value and net realized and unrealized gains (losses) are reported in the accompanying combined statements of activities. 7. PARISH SAVINGS AND INVESTMENT PROGRAMS

The Diocese administers parish savings and parish investment programs. These programs have been established for the benefit of diocesan parishes, schools, and agencies. Interest was earned at Prime less 3.75% for the savings program and Prime less 2.75% for the investment program in fiscal 2008 and 2007. The Prime rate was 5.00% and 8.25% for June 30, 2008 and 2007, respectively. Savings program funds may be withdrawn at any time, whereas withdrawal of investment program funds is subject to a minimum 18-month investment period. Funds on deposit related to these programs along with accrued interest totaled $27,591,931 and $21,830,139 at June 30, 2008 and 2007, respectively, and are reflected as custodial obligations in the accompanying combined statements of financial position.

8. PENSION AND RETIREMENT PLANS

Lay Noncontributory Defined Benefit Pension Plan — The Central Administration sponsors a noncontributory defined benefit pension plan (the "Lay Plan") for all eligible diocesan lay employees. The Lay Plan provides for benefits based on an employee's years of service and compensation. Each diocesan entity was assessed 4.5% of lay employees' salaries to fund the contribution to the Lay Plan and certain other employee benefits. It is the intent of the Central Administration for the minimum funding to be the actuarially recommended contribution amount.

The funded status and other information of the Lay Plan as of June 30, 2008 and 2007, is set forth in the following tables.

In addition, the policy stipulates socially responsible investment guidelines, investment return objectives, both in the aggregate and relative to applicable investment benchmarks, minimum standards for investment holdings, and other guidelines for the investment of Plan assets.

The estimated contribution to the Lay Plan for fiscal year 2009 is approximately $1,575,000.

Tax-Deferred Annuity Plan — The Central Administration sponsors a tax-deferred defined contribution plan under Section 403(b) of the Internal Revenue Code for all eligible diocesan employees. Employer-matching contributions to the plan are based on a percentage of employee contributions. Each diocesan entity is responsible for payment of the matching contribution directly to the tax-deferred defined contribution plan.

Priest Retirement Plan — The Central Administration sponsors the Diocese of Charlotte Priest Retirement Plan (the "Priest Plan") to provide pension benefits for diocesan priests. The Priest Plan provides for benefits, for priests who are fully vested, in a uniform monthly amount that is increased annually. An annual collection is held at each parish to raise funds for priest retirement and other priest benefits. Each parish was assigned 3.5% of annual offertory as their goal for this collection for fiscal 2008 and 2007. Any shortfall from goal in the amount collected is paid by the parish. Annual collections from the parishes for this purpose are reported as temporarily restricted revenues in the accompanying combined statements of activities. It is the intent of the Central Administration for the minimum funding to be the actuarially recommended contribution amount.

The funded status and other information of the Priest Plan as of June 30, 2008 and 2007, is set forth in the following tables:

EMPLOYEE HEALTH BENEFITS

The Diocese administers medical and dental insurance coverage for eligible employees of the Diocese. The Diocese charges each organization premiums for coverage of its employees on a monthly basis. The individual organizations have no liability for claims in excess of the premiums to be paid. The Diocese has an arrangement with a third party to administer the medical and dental insurance. Approximately 11% and 14% of the premiums submitted by diocesan entities were paid to the third-party administrator for administrative services. The premiums for specific and aggregate stop-loss coverages in fiscal 2008 and 2007, respectively. The remaining portion of the premiums is designated by the Diocese to pay claims which are processed by the third-party administrator. The Diocese has specific stop-loss coverage at $125,000 per employee in fiscal 2008 and 2007, and aggregate coverage beginning at 120% of the actuarially projected total individual claims under $125,000 for fiscal 2008 and 2007. The amount paid for employee health benefits was $6,541,270 and $5,342,164 in fiscal 2008 and 2007, respectively.

NOTES PAYABLE

The Diocese had an unsecured line of credit from a bank for $10,000,000 as of June 30, 2007, which expired on December 31, 2007. The line of credit accrued interest at the monthly LIBOR index plus 1.0% (6.32% at June 30, 2007). There were no outstanding borrowings under this line of credit at both June 30, 2008 and 2007.

In addition, the Diocese has certain notes outstanding with a bank ("Parish Notes"). The proceeds from the Parish Notes are being used to finance various parish construction and capital improvement projects as well as the purchase of equipment. Principal and interest payments on the Parish Notes are currently being paid to the bank directly by the specific parishes benefiting from the use of the proceeds. As of June 30, 2008, all principal and interest payments were current. However, if any parishes default on payments of principal and interest, it is likely that the Diocese would look to the Central Administration for payment. A combined entity, for funding. At June 30, 2008 and 2007, the Central Administration had not recognized any liabilities related to Parish Notes in the accompanying combined financial statements. The outstanding amount under these notes was $12,176,164 and $23,247,545 at June 30, 2008 and 2007, respectively. In addition, the Diocese has entered into certain interest rate swap agreements on the Parish Notes with notional amounts totaling $9,426,872 and $3,043,623 as of June 30, 2008 and 2007, respectively. The fair value of these interest rate swap agreements was $(267,251) as of June 30, 2008.

BONDS PAYABLE

Series 2000 Bonds — In June 2000, the North Carolina Educational Facilities Financial Agency issued $19,700,000 of variable rate educational facilities revenue bonds ("Series 2000 Bonds") with final maturity, subject to prior redemption, on June 1, 2017. The proceeds therefrom have been loaned to the Diocese, and are administered by the Central Administration. The proceeds have been used to finance the acquisition, construction, installation, and equipping of the current campus of BMCHS, and to refinance the construction and equipping of a MACS entity, as well as to pay a portion of the interest on the bonds and to pay bond issue costs. The Central Administration allocates a pro rata portion of the Series 2000 Bonds to BMCHS and MACS. These affiliated entities have recorded their pro rata interest expense and resulting payable to the Central Administration within their respective combined financial statements.

Principal and interest payments on the Series 2000 Bonds are supported by an irrevocable, direct-pay letter of credit by a bank. The letter of credit, which expires on August 5, 2009 (subject to earlier termination or extension in accordance with the letter-of-credit agreement), supports the entire loan amount. The annual fee associated with this letter of credit is 0.32%.

The mandatory redemption of the Series 2000 Bonds is being provided by sinking fund payments beginning in June 2002 and ending June 2017. Interest accrues at a variable rate and is due quarterly. The interest rate fluctuates on a weekly basis and was 1.50% and 3.77% at June 30, 2008 and 2007, respectively.

In June 2004, the Central Administration entered into an 11-year interest rate swap agreement for a portion of the Series 2000 Bonds, with an effective date of June 1, 2006. The notional amount of the agreement at June 30, 2008, was $11,250,000. The agreement requires the Diocese to pay the counterparty a 4.50% fixed rate of interest on the notional amount. In return, the counterparty will pay the Diocese interest at a variable rate based on the published TBMA index in accordance with the swap agreement. The Diocese recorded the interest rate swap in accordance with FASB Statement No. 133, Accounting for Derivative Instruments and Hedging Activities, as amended, and did not designate the derivative as a hedge instrument. The fair value of this derivative of $(712,556) and $(394,791) as of June 30, 2008 and 2007, respectively, is reported as the fair market value of interest rate swap agreement in the accompanying combined statements of financial position and changes in the fair value are reflected as the change in fair market value of interest rate swap agreements in the accompanying combined statements of activities.

Series 2002 Bonds — In November 2002, Mauricio W. West, as Administrator of the Diocese, issued variable rate demand bonds for the benefit of MACS ("Series 2002 Bonds"). The initial issuance was in the principal amount of $3,000,000 with subsequent issuances, so that the maximum amount authorized of $15,800,000 was issued. The proceeds therefrom have been used to finance the construction and equipping of new MACS' facilities and to pay bond issuance costs. The Series 2002 Bonds will mature, subject to prior redemption, on May 1, 2014.

Principal and interest payments on the Series 2002 Bonds are supported by an irrevocable, direct-pay letter of credit by a bank. As of June 30, 2007, the letter of credit, which expires on December 6, 2008 (subject to earlier termination or extension in accordance with the letter-of-credit agreement), supports the entire loan amount. Management anticipates obtaining an extension of the letter of credit prior to its expiration date. The annual fee associated with this letter of credit is 0.45%.

Interest accrues at a variable rate and is due monthly. The interest rate is adjusted weekly as the bonds are remarketed and was 2.58% and 5.32% at June 30, 2008 and 2007, respectively. The Diocese has covenanted that it will cause the bonds to be redeemed from May 2004 through May 2014. As of June 30, 2008, the Diocese has made the required principal payments according to the redemption schedule.

The Series 2002 bond issue has been tendered by the bond holders as of September 24, 2008. The remarketing agent has been unsuccessful in remarketing the bonds as of the tender date. As required by the terms of the bond indenture, the bank direct-pay letter of credit has been drawn on to pay the tendering holders, creating a reimbursement obligation to Wachovia Bank with the following terms: interest is calculated at the bank's prime rate (5.0% as of September 24, 2008) and payable quarterly, and the outstanding principal balance is due in full on December 6, 2008. The Diocese is negotiating with the bank for extended payment terms. The remarketing agent is obligated to continue to try to remarket the bonds. If successful, the Diocese's reimbursement obligation to Wachovia Bank is satisfied with the remarketing proceeds.

In December 2002, the Diocese entered into a 12-year interest rate swap agreement for the benefit of MACS for a portion of the Series 2002 Bonds. The notional amount of the agreement at June 30, 2008, was $8,955,000. The agreement requires MACS to pay the counterparty a 4.4% fixed rate of interest on the notional amount. In return, the counterparty will pay MACS interest at a variable rate based on the published LIBOR index in accordance with the swap agreement. MACS recorded the interest rate swap in accordance with FASB Statement No. 133, Accounting for Derivative Instruments and Hedging Activities, as amended, and did not designate the derivative as a hedge instrument. The fair value of this derivative of $(156,810) and $321,653 as of June 30, 2008 and 2007, respectively, is reported as the fair market value of interest rate swap agreement in the accompanying combined statements of financial position and changes in the fair value are reflected as the change in fair market value of interest rate swap agreement in the accompanying combined statements of activities.

The future repayment requirements of the Series 2000 and 2002 Bonds, assuming the bonds continue to be remarketed and mature over their scheduled repayment terms, are as follows:

	SERIES 2000 BONDS	SERIES 2002 BONDS	TOTAL
2009	$ 1,150,000	$ 1,565,000	$ 2,715,000
2010	1,320,000	1,905,000	3,225,000
2011	1,480,000	2,020,000	3,500,000
2012	1,660,000	2,160,000	3,820,000
2013	1,870,000	2,280,000	4,150,000
THEREAFTER	7,520,000	2,010,000	9,530,000

AMOUNTS OUTSTANDING —

JUNE 30, 2008	$15,000,000	$11,940,000	$26,940,000

The estimated fair value of the bonds payable approximates its carrying value. The fair value has been estimated based on rates currently available to the Diocese for debt with similar terms and remaining maturities.

12. FACILITIES USAGE AND LEASE AGREEMENTS

MACS has agreements with participating parishes and the Central Administration for their use of various facilities, with terms ranging from 12 to 18 years. These agreements provide for contingent rentals based on usage and may be amended or modified at any time. Expenses totaled $512,753 and $522,755 for fiscal 2008 and 2007, respectively, and are reported within regional and diocesan schools administration expense in the accompanying combined statements of activities.

In November 2003, MACS entered into an agreement to lease the former All Saints School to a third party beginning July 1, 2004, for a 10-year period. In 2004, MACS paid to a broker a leasing commission of $222,000. In 2005, MACS paid an additional $208,673 in leasing commission to the broker. This total leasing commission is being amortized over the life of the lease. Rental revenue is recognized on a straight-line basis over the life of the lease. As revenue recognized as of June 30, 2008 and 2007, exceeded rental payments received, a deferred rent asset of $633,181 and $516,950 is recorded on the combined statements of financial position as of June 30, 2008 and 2007, respectively.

The Diocese is the lessor in a ground lease agreement and the lessee in a space lease agreement with the same third party. In fiscal year 2003, the third party paid to the Diocese the net amount due for the entire terms of these lease agreements of $290,128. The Diocese is also responsible for monthly payments relating to the operating costs associated with the space lease agreement. Prepaid rent relating to the space lease of $984,779 and $1,019,536 at June 30, 2008 and 2007, respectively, is included in deferred rent in the accompanying combined statements of financial position. Unearned revenue relating to the ground lease of $1,150,411 and $1,191,014 at June 30, 2008 and 2007, respectively, is reflected in the accompanying combined statements of financial position. The prepaid rent expense on the space lease and the unearned revenue related to the ground lease are both being amortized on a straight-line basis over the lives of the respective leases.

13. CONTINGENCIES

From time to time, the Diocese is subject to various disputes and legal proceedings arising in the ordinary course of its business. Management is of the opinion, based upon information presently available, that it is unlikely that any liability to the extent not provided for through insurance or otherwise, would be material in relation to the Diocese financial position or operations.

Protecting God's Children

We proclaim Christ to the world around us by our efforts to provide a safe environment for all people, especially the young and the vulnerable.

In 2002, the U.S. bishops issued the Charter for the Protection of Children and Young People (charter). The charter addressed the Catholic Church's commitment to respond effectively, appropriately and compassionately to cases of abuse of minors by priests, deacons or other church personnel.

On July 1, 2003, the diocese issued the revised Policy of the Diocese of Charlotte Concerning Ministry-Related Sexual Misconduct by Church Personnel. Our diocesan policy covers requirements for reporting abuse; screening of clergy, religious, seminarians and lay employees; procedures when allegations are made; education, media and communications; and sanctions for non-compliance. All diocesan personnel who work with children receive a copy of the policy, acknowledge its receipt and are required to comply with the policy in its entirety. All employees and volunteers are also required to comply with the Diocese of Charlotte Code of Ethics, which was issued Aug. 15, 2004.

In August 2008, the Diocese of Charlotte underwent an audit conducted by the Gavin Group, an agency contracted by the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops to ascertain and document the progress made by dioceses in the United States in the implementation of the charter. This audit covered the period of July 2007 through June 2008. At the compliance audit's conclusion, the Diocese of Charlotte was found to be compliant with all articles of the charter.

Researchers have reported that there is no reliable way to predict in advance who might abuse a child. Therefore, the best preventive measures available to us are effective policies that check the backgrounds of caregivers, direct how care of children is to be provided and provide education about what abuse is and how it occurs.

The "Protecting God's Children" training program enables the diocese to educate those who work most closely with children to recognize and prevent sexual abuse. To date, more than 18,000 employees and volunteers have attended this training at nearly 700 workshops held throughout the diocese. During this past fiscal year, approximately 3,200 diocesan personnel attended these training sessions.

The diocese also recognizes its responsibility to safeguard the young and the vulnerable through adequate screening of clergy, religious, employees and volunteers. In the past year, 3,863 background checks were processed.

Our diocese has a victim assistance coordinator to assist victims of sexual abuse, whether the abuse took place in the Diocese of Charlotte or in another diocese. In 1995, the diocese established a review board to serve as a confidential consultative body to the bishop. The board reviews cases of sexual abuse of minors that are reported to the diocese.

These activities represent a significant commitment by the diocese to provide a safe environment for our children and young people. The cost of the various programs and measures outlined herein totaled $76,390 during the fiscal year ending June 30, 2008.

Our response as a diocese will always be one of sincere compassion in addressing the personal, psychological and spiritual needs of the people God entrusted to its care. When abusive conduct is reported, in addition to immediate action and investigation into the allegation, an immediate response to the alleged victim and his/her family is undertaken. During this year, the diocese provided financial assistance to, or on behalf of, victims totaling $10,860, all of which was for counseling. As in the past, none of these funds came from the Diocesan Support Appeal or from parish savings.

The many ministries that support a safe environment for children and young people truly proclaim the good news of Christ's work within the Diocese of Charlotte.

"Jesus said go out two by two," Ramirez remarked after a ceremony Nov. 2 that commissioned him and 12 others to go about the county inviting members of the Hispanic community to become part of the parish at St. John the Evangelist Church in Waynesville.

"After baptism we're called to evangelize," Ramirez said, "so that's what we're going to do."

PUSHING POLITICAL BUTTONS

Father Bob Williams, pastor of St. Justin Church in Hazel Park, Mich., and a judge with the archdiocesan metropolitan tribunal, poses with one of his political campaign buttons Nov. 2. Father Williams has been collecting the buttons for 38 years and now has 25,000 in his collection.

Priest's love of politics 'mushroomed' into massive button collection

HAZEL PARK, Mich. (CNS) — Father Bob Williams has a lot of reasons to love election season — about 25,000 of them, in fact.

Father Williams, pastor of St. Justin Church in Hazel Park and a judge with the Detroit archdiocesan metropolitan tribunal, has been collecting political campaign buttons for 38 years, amassing 25,000 in the process.

Starting at age 17, picking up a button here and there on various campaigns, he now buys, sells and trades them as he picks up duplicates and finds ones he has yet to add to his collection.

While many Americans might have gotten sick of hearing political ads wherever they turned before Election Day this year, Father Williams, a self-professed political junkie, revels in the nonstop coverage.

"I love politics," he said. "It mushroomed from there."

Father Williams started collecting buttons in 1972. Although some collectors focus on one particular person, or one political party, he collects from both parties, all elections, winners and losers, although he does focus on governors, senators and members of Congress.

The priest is a member of the American Political Items Collectors, and goes to trade shows and conventions when he can. He gets buttons from people he knows who find them when cleaning out the basement or attic, but he does a lot of his buying and selling on eBay, the online auction site.

He has seen some buttons online for thousands of dollars, and many for hundreds, but among his more expensive buttons is a $350 "Mayberry for Governor" pin, promoting the Democrat who lost the bid for Michigan's top spot in 1900. He has buttons from as early as 1890, when they were first made out of metal.

He finds that a lot of people who get involved in collecting political buttons are involved in campaigns or are history professors, political science teachers or history buffs, he said.

His entire collection has been scanned, stored digitally on his computer and then cataloged and, as he gets new buttons, those get scanned in batches. This makes it easier for him to show off his collection at trade shows.

If for nothing else, he said, he loves his collection for his own enjoyment and as his own museum, and added that his nieces and nephews will probably sell it when he's gone. But for now, he enjoys the different styles of buttons and continues to look for rare finds.

"Lots of people think I'm nuts," he said, although he pointed out that many other people collect strange things, too. "Everyone has their own."

Catholics begin to distribute aid to Pakistanis affected by quake

QUETTA, Pakistan (CNS) — Catholics have begun distributing aid to people affected by the recent earthquake in a remote part of Balochistan province.

Parishioners of St. Pius X Church in Quetta traveled nearly 50 miles northeast to Wam, and distributed aid they collected among themselves.

Quetta is the capital of Balochistan, considered Pakistan's most underdeveloped province.

"Announcements were made in church for the collection of essential commodities for the quake victims. After visiting the affected families for a few hours, we handed over packets of lentils, tea and sugar," Father Maqsood Nazir, the parish priest, told the Asian church news agency UCA News.

He said the Nov. 1 delivery was the first aid response from the Catholic Church following the Oct. 29 earthquake.

The priest led a group of seven parishioners who traveled overnight to reach Wam, one of the worst-hit villages.

"It was a dangerous journey on narrow and winding roads in the mountains," he said.

"Village children started following our vehicle as we came close to the rubble of mud houses," said Father Nazir.

About 300 people died and an estimated 40,000 were left homeless when the magnitude 6.4 quake struck before dawn.

It flattened mud-brick houses as people slept, and continuing aftershocks forced survivors to sleep outdoors at altitudes of 8,200 feet in very cold temperatures.

Religious organizations and political parties have set up collection centers across the country for donations of money and warm clothes.

FROM THE VATICAN

Financial crisis is reminder to help poor, says Vatican's U.N. nuncio

UNITED NATIONS (CNS)—Public reaction to the current financial crisis should not be limited to criticisms of what went wrong or expressions of sympathy to those most affected, said Archbishop Celestino Migliore, the Vatican's apostolic nuncio to the United Nations.

Instead, world leaders need to "come up with the ways and means to avoid similar crises in the future," he said.

In an Oct. 30 address to the U.N. General Assembly as part of a panel discussion on the global financial crisis, the archbishop urged delegates not to forget those "at the edges of the financial system" such as retirees, small family businesses, cottage industries and those who rely on their savings as an essential means of support.

"Above all," he said, "there is a need to invest in people. Once the inevitable financial salvage operations are over, governments and the international community should invest their money in aid to the poorest populations."

Archbishop Migliore said blame for the current financial crisis could not just be placed on an ineffective regulatory system because it also extended to "the broader realm of ethical codes and moral conduct. Unbridled profiteering and the unscrupulous pursuit of gain at any cost have made people forget basic rules of business ethics."

He also commented on the lifestyles and values of the general public, saying that "increased and uncontrolled consumption" without regard for savings is "economically unsustainable."

Father Miguel d'Escoto Brockmann, currently serving as president of the General Assembly, said the stakes were "too high for half-measures or quick fixes put together behind closed doors." He said solutions "must involve all countries in a democratic process."

Exhibit opens as debate continues over Pope Pius XII's wartime role

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — The Vatican opened a major exhibit on the life and pontificate of Pope Pius XII, highlighting the late pope's actions on behalf of Jews and others who suffered during World War II.

The retrospective show — featuring photos, articles of clothing and documents — opened Nov. 4 in an exhibition hall adjacent to St. Peter's Square.

Several sections of the exhibit are dedicated to the Vatican's actions during the war. Pope Pius is described as a "defender of peace" who opened Vatican properties to refugees and created an office to help prisoners of war and their families.

The pope is pictured standing amid the Roman populace after aerial bombardment of the city, visiting the Vatican bakery that furnished free bread to residents, and meeting in 1943 with Jews who escaped deportation to concentration camps.

Press clippings and letters attesting to the pope's courage in defending the Jews are included, along with transcripts of the pope's radio broadcasts during the war.

To help demonstrate the pope's clear anti-Nazi sentiments, one glass case displays pages of a draft version of the 1937 encyclical "With Burning Concern," which condemned the racism and paganism of the Nazi regime. The text was written by Pope Pius XI, but with assistance from his secretary of state, then-Cardinal Eugenio Pacelli — elected two years later as Pope Pius XII — whose margin notes are clearly visible.

The exhibit opened as an international debate continued over the late pope's actions during the war. Some Jewish groups have said he did little to mobilize the church in defense of Jews, while other experts have gathered evidence to show he worked quietly but effectively to save the lives of thousands of Jews.

Msgr. Walter Brandmuller, president of the Pontifical Committee for Historical Sciences, told a press conference that the exhibit should help demonstrate that "the accusations against (Pope Pius XII) cannot be based on historical research, which ever more convincingly demonstrates how groundless they are."

Much of the Vatican exhibit presents a human side of the pope, including his early years as a boy in a neighborhood not far from the Vatican. The exhibit runs to Jan. 6.

Vatican, Botswana establish full diplomatic relations

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — The Vatican and Botswana established full diplomatic relations Nov. 4, raising to 177 the number of countries that exchange ambassadors with the Vatican.

A Vatican statement said that although just over 5 percent of Botswana's 1.6 million people are Catholic, good relations exist between the government and the Catholic Church.

"The church is particularly involved in assistance to the sick and orphans, in the prevention of disease and in opening new schools," the statement said.

Botswana enjoys a stable, multiparty democracy, but a high percentage of its people are living with the HIV virus.

The Vatican said Catholic missionaries first arrived in the southern African country in 1850, but opened their first school and mission only in 1928.

Currently, the country has one diocese and one apostolic vicariate, 27 diocesan priests, 38 parishes, 40 religious-order priests, four religious brothers, 77 sisters and about 300 lay catechists.

Catholic Church ends funding to ACORN

CCHD funds suspended over financial irregularities

BY DAVID HAINS
COMMUNICATIONS DIRECTOR

CHARLOTTE — ACORN is no longer receiving funding from the Catholic Church.

The Association of Community Organizations for Reform Now, commonly known as ACORN, came under scrutiny during the 2008 presidential election campaign for its voter registration practices.

However, the Catholic Campaign for Human Development (CCHD) had already suspended funding for ACORN after it was disclosed in June that nearly $1 million had been embezzled.

The decision to suspend funding was because of ACORN's financial irregularities, not its voter registration activities, according to Ralph McCloud, executive director of CCHD, the U.S. bishops' domestic anti-poverty and social justice program.

"We're not funding them at any level," McCloud told Catholic News Service Oct. 15.

In the Diocese of Charlotte, a special collection for CCHD will take place during the Nov. 22-23 weekend Masses.

Mary Jane Bruton, diocesan director for CCHD, said the diocesan 2007 collection raised $198,962 from the 92 parishes and missions of the diocese.

Of that total, $45,015 was given to groups within the diocese. Bruton said no local funds were given to ACORN and that the Diocese of Charlotte has never directly funded a local ACORN organization.

In urging continued support for CCHD, Bruton said, "The Catholic Campaign for Human Development enjoys wide support across the country from people who have seen its effectiveness in their own dioceses."

"They have seen the results in self-sufficiency, stronger families and people rising above poverty with resources found within their own communities," she added.

The suspension by the national CCHD covers all 40 ACORN affiliates nationwide that had been approved for $1.13 million in grants for the funding cycle that started July 1, 2008.

McCloud said the suspension had come soon after his office learned ACORN disclosed that Dale Rathke, the brother of ACORN founder Wade Rathke, had embezzled nearly $1 million from the organization and its affiliates in 1999 and 2000.

Dale Rathke stepped down from his position with the organization in June when the matter became public; no charges were filed against him. Wade Rathke stepped down as the group's lead organizer at the same time but remains chief organizer for ACORN International LLC.

Traditionally drawn to causes usually backed by Democrats, the 38-year-old organization has conducted organizing campaigns in low- and moderate-income communities on issues such as unemployment, affordable housing, predatory lending, health care, minimum wage and living wage, and immigration.

ACORN also has conducted voter registration drives throughout its history by hiring canvassers to go door to door and to visit public sites where people gather.

The organization has more than 1,200 chapters in 110 cities, according to its Web site.

Auxiliary Bishop Roger P. Morin of New Orleans, who chairs the U.S. bishops' CCHD subcommittee, said in a mid-October letter to his fellow bishops that a task force has been formed as part of a multipronged effort designed to ensure that church funds are being spent for projects that are consistent with CCHD guidelines.

In his letter, Bishop Morin said the task force's efforts have included:

— Contracting with forensic accounting experts to determine if any CCHD money was taken or misused;

— A meeting of CCHD officials, USCCB representatives and Bishop Morin with ACORN leaders to "express serious concerns and to seek answers to specific questions"; — And consulting with CCHD diocesan directors to review the work of ACORN locally, reviewing the relationship between diocesan directors and the group's local affiliates, and assessing the quality and impact of the group's work in low-income communities.

"The current halt of ACORN funding means that no CCHD funds are involved in any of these activities," Bishop Morin said in his letter.

The CCHD subcommittee will convene to discuss its findings during the U.S. bishops' meeting Nov. 10-13 in Baltimore, Md.

their founder, Father HoLung, who was one of the speakers at the Diocese of Charlotte's Eucharistic Congress in Charlotte Oct. 3-4.

After the congress, Father HoLung stayed for a week to help the brothers get settled into their new home behind Our Lady of Lourdes Church. The house was blessed by Bishop Peter J. Jugis Oct. 29.

"They rejoice to pour themselves out in service to the poor," said Bishop Jugis, who invited the brothers to establish a mission in the diocese.

"They find the crucified Christ in the persons of the suffering poor, the homeless, the disabled, the orphans, the sick, the destitute, and they share the joy of Christ with them," the bishop said.

"Our work is really to attend to the needs of the less fortunate," said Brother Rodel Tabanao. "We believe that we can find the least of our brothers and sisters even here in Monroe."

The brothers are still in the process of assessing the needs of the local community, and also are looking for a property where they can establish their outreach ministry.

"We are planning to establish our monastery so that we can have a place of prayer, a place of reflection and study for the brothers and also for those who will be joining us from this area," said Brother Rodel.

Also on the agenda is learning how to speak Spanish so that the brothers can reach out to the large Hispanic population in Monroe.

The brothers have already made their mark at Our Lady of Lourdes Church by providing musical accompaniment at the Saturday vigil Masses in the trademark MOP Caribbean style.

"Because of music, we have been able to sustain our ministry," said Brother Rodel.

"It is really an inspiration from the Lord," he said of the songs, which are written by Father HoLung.

One unique aspect of being part of a newly established religious order is the direct contact the brothers have with their founder. "There is a father and son relationship that I think all of us have felt," said Brother Rodel.

"It's a great privilege to live with the founder," he said, adding that the close relationship gives the brothers a better understanding of Father HoLung's vision for their order.

Since the order was founded in 1981, it has grown to include more than 500 brothers who take vows of poverty, chastity, obedience and free service to the poor.

Brother Rodel and Brother Paulo Gudoy have made their final profession of vows.

Brother Paulo said he was first introduced to the missionaries of the poor when he was in Catholic school in the Philippines. He admired the simple lifestyle of the brothers. As a brother, he said, he has "truly experienced the joy of being with the Lord."

"The community life, the prayer life and the works among the poor are really what sustain me to serve the Lord," said Brother Paulo. "No one can take that joy from me."

The other two brothers, Brother Nowel Rebamonte and Brother William Samad, are in the temporary stage of their vows and will take final vows in 2013.

Although the transition to life in the United States has gone relatively smoothly, it has not been without its challenges. One thing all of the brothers said they miss is the close-knit community with their brothers in Jamaica.

"In Jamaica we had at least 100 brothers coming together for meals, for prayer, for worship, for work and for recreation," said Brother Rodel.

They also miss their work, he said.

In Jamaica the brothers worked with AIDS patients, and handicapped children and adults.

"Being here, we don't see that kind of poverty," said Brother Rodel.

But the brothers are making every effort to make their presence known in the community.

They have started visiting nursing homes and making house calls, especially in some of the poor Hispanic neighborhoods.

They have also taken on the task of providing and serving meals at the community shelter on the fourth Sunday of each month.

"We have a lot of friends in North Carolina who have been to Jamaica," said Brother Rodel. "I think that is part of our appreciation for the diocese."

"We have come here to offer our services, because not all can come to Jamaica," he said. "We will try to bring what we have in Jamaica and establish it here. It may not be the same poverty as what we had there, but it will be the same spirit of MOP."

"Father HoLung has said, 'We are God's love of the poor in the world,'" said Bishop Jugis. "The Missionaries of the Poor will help us in our diocese open our eyes to the poor and the rejected living right here among us, and inspire us to serve them with devoted Christ-like love."

Augustinian Father Liam Tomás O'Doherty blesses Javier Ramirez, one of 13 Hispanic lay missionaries from St. John the Evangelist Church in Waynesville Nov. 2.

Lay missionaries to evangelize in Hispanic community

Ramirez has been visiting Haywood County's Hispanic residents on his own for the past year. It's a major endeavor, especially for someone with a family and a busy job with a landscaping service.

So, at the 5 p.m. Spanish-language Mass at the church Oct. 19, Ramirez invited others to join him. Twelve people accepted the invitation.

Like the others who volunteered, Brenda Arroyo wants to evangelize "so we all know what God's plan is for us and to build more community."

The following Sunday, Oct. 26, Eduardo Bernal, Hispanic ministry coordinator for the Smoky Mountain Vicariate, conducted training for the new volunteers.

Bernal and two men engaged in similar work at St. Mary, Mother of God Church in Sylva led role-playing exercises to show the new missionaries what to expect during home visits.

After the 5 p.m. Mass Nov. 2, Augustinian Father Liam Tomás O'Doherty called the missionaries to the foot of the altar and commissioned them, as the rest of the congregation extended their hands in blessing.

"There are four groups that are going out to Waynesville, Clyde, Canton, and Bethel," said Brenda Arroyo, 25. "We're going to go out to let people know where the church is, what the services are."

"As far as I know, this is completely from the people," Father O'Doherty said later. "It's not something the priests thought of."

Father O'Doherty, in residence at the Augustinians' Blessed of Lecceto Friary at St. Margaret of Scotland Church in Maggie Valley, is being tutored in Spanish by Ramirez.

The missionary work starting here has been done in other parts of the diocese, Arroyo said, but this is the first time it has been attempted in Haywood County.

"We just want the people in the Hispanic community to get involved," said Rocio Quintero, 17, a high school student.

"This is also to help keep people informed about things we're doing, like baptisms and pre-Cana conferences," she said.

The first visit is to get acquainted, said Arroyo, who graduated from Belmont Abbey College last year.

On subsequent visits, "We read Scripture or pray the rosary," she said.

Once visitors become better acquainted with the missionaries, "they begin to tell us their needs. If we go to visit them, they'll feel that someone cares about them," said Arroyo.

"Other (non-Catholic) churches are the ones that go to see them," Quintero said.

The missionaries want to change that and encourage Hispanic people, most of whom are Catholic, to return to active involvement in their Catholic faith.

And Arroyo worries about the migrant workers, who "don't have anyone to visit them."

But how can they find out where the people are? One way is simply to become acquainted with the people one encounters every day.

"Just going to stores, I see people I've never seen before," Quintero said. "In school I can ask them if they have other family members and we grow from there."

About 130 adults and children, most of them Hispanic, attend the 5 p.m. Spanish-language Mass at St. John the Evangelist Church. The missionaries intend to devote themselves to increasing that number.

Catholic parishes help build Habitat house

80 Catholic volunteers contribute 900 hours to project

ASHEVILLE — A new Habitat for Humanity house in Asheville was made possible in part by several Catholic parishes.

The 10th "interfaith Habitat house" was financed and built by 10 Asheville-area faith communities, including four Catholic parishes — St. Barnabas Church in Arden, the Basilica of St. Lawrence and St. Eugene Church in Asheville, and St. Margaret Mary Church in Swannanoa.

About 80 Catholic volunteers contributed approximately 900 hours to the project, which began Aug. 19 and concluded Oct. 24. A prayer service was held at the house Oct. 22.

Forum may open new chapter in Catholic-Muslim relations history of Catholic-Muslim relations.

French Cardinal Jean-Louis Tauran, president of the Pontifical Council for Interreligious Dialogue, gave interviews in early November to Vatican Radio and to the French Catholic newspaper La Croix.

He told Vatican Radio that the Nov. 4-6 meeting with representatives of the 138 Muslim scholars who began the Common Word initiative in 2007 would give participants an opportunity to explain their faiths through their understanding of the commandments to love God and to love one's neighbor.

While theological points underlie the discussion, "properly speaking, one cannot say that we have a theological dialogue," he said in the Nov. 3 interview with Vatican Radio.

Rather, he said, the Vatican's dialogues with Muslims have focused on ethical questions, spirituality and joint action on behalf of the suffering.

He told La Croix Nov. 2: "At the moment theological dialogue has not really begun. We will see with the Forum, when we will speak of the love of God, how far we can go together."

"What is important is to know the theological thinking of the other" and to share the riches that come from our respective religious traditions, he said.

The second day of the meeting is expected to focus on human dignity and mutual respect, and Cardinal Tauran said he hoped that would be an opportunity for the Vatican to voice its concerns about "The questions is how do we get these real openings we have with the elite to filter down to the masses."

the limits on freedom of conscience and religious practice Catholics face in some Muslim countries.

Cardinal Tauran said it is natural to want reciprocity and to believe that the freedom that is good for Muslims in Europe, for example, would be good for Christians in the Middle East.

"But beware," he said, "the principle of reciprocity is not a prerequisite for dialogue; this is not the logic of 'Do ut des' (I give so that you will give). That would be anti-Christian."

Instead, he said, ensuring respect for each other's beliefs and rights is something that results from gradually changing attitudes.

While several high-level initiatives give hope that changes will take place, the cardinal said, "the problem is that these initiatives of dialogue seem very hit-and-miss compared to the daily stories of anti-Christian violence in several countries."

"The question is how do we get these real openings we have with the elite to filter down to the masses," he said.

Catholics, Muslims gather in Indiana for annual Midwest dialogue

CROWN POINT, Ind. (CNS) — In a first for the Diocese of Gary, Catholics and Muslims gathered there for the annual Midwest Muslim-Catholic Dialogue Oct. 26-28.

They met at Catholic and Islamic institutions to engage in interreligious dialogue because, as its mission statement declares, the dialogue "is part of our core identity as people of faith."

Representatives from several states and the District of Columbia attended a series of scholarly sessions and public sessions dealing with such issues as religious freedom, religion in the public square and immigration, as well as an analysis of the American legal structure as it relates to Islamic law.

Joan Crist, director of the Gary diocesan Office of Ecumenism and Interreligious Affairs, said the purpose of the dialogue, started in 1996, is to "create understanding between our two religions."

Sessions were held at the Northwest Indiana Islamic Center in Crown Point, Calumet College of St. Joseph in Whiting and the Gary Diocese's pastoral center in Merrillville. The schedule allowed time for the five daily prayers of Islam and for Masses and Catholic prayer services.

Gary Bishop Dale J. Melczek, offering a welcome Oct. 26 at the Islamic center, said that in the past year leaders from both faiths have made public efforts toward making peace between the two groups.

Noting that Christians and Muslims comprise 55 percent of the world's population, the bishop quoted from a Muslim letter that stated: "If Muslims and Christians are not at peace, the world cannot be at peace."

Quoting from the Quran, the sacred book of Islam, the bishop noted that "without giving the neighbor what we ourselves love, we do not truly love God or the neighbor." He likened that to the apostle James, who wrote: "My brothers, what good is it to profess faith without practicing it?"

The bishop also quoted from Catholic bishops in Africa who said that although Catholics and Muslims hold some similar fundamental religious values — the need for prayer, the uniqueness of God and the importance of almsgiving, fasting and pilgrimages — bigotry, intolerance, militarism and fundamentalism by a tiny minority are the main sources of conflict.

While these bishops acknowledged these challenges, Bishop Melczek said, "they urged that we place the difficulties in the hands of God and move forward with a spirit of hope."

In his welcome, Imam Mongy el Quesny, the Islamic center's spiritual leader, listed some of the religious figures both faiths hold in common, including Noah, Moses, Jacob, Joseph, Benjamin, Aaron and John the Baptist.

"Let us come together for a common word," the imam said, and that word is justice.

He added that Christians and Muslims both have lived in this country for a long time, but he said it was not until he spent some time in New York that he experienced tension between the two groups.

He prayed the dialogue would help the two groups "bring all the issues that can bring us together."

He also prayed that God would give dialogue participants knowledge and compassion to "lead to a straight path to God ... and forgive any mistakes we made in this life."

you strength and wisdom to meet the coming challenges," he said.

But he also said, "We stand ready to work with you in defense and support of the life and dignity of every human person."

In Nov. 5 statements, blog postings and other comments, Catholic leaders praised Obama for his history-making victory. Some said the Democrat's win "best reflected" Catholic values "of hope, personal responsibility and care for the common good."

But others, including Catholic bishops, said they hoped the new administration would make decisions that show a "commitment to the sanctity and dignity of all human life."

Still other Catholics, including pro-life leaders, expressed profound disappointment that a candidate who supports abortion rights was elected and vowed that the pro-life movement would grow in strength.

Catholic response

In his letter to Obama, released by the USCCB in Washington, Cardinal George said that "the country is confronting many uncertainties. We pray that you will use the powers of your office to meet them with a special concern to defend the most vulnerable among us and heal the divisions in our country and our world."

Archbishop Donald W. Wuerl of Washington said in a statement: "We offer our prayers today for our nation and for our newly elected leaders, including President-elect Obama, as they take on their new responsibilities."

"We rejoice with the rest of our nation in the significance" of Obama's victory, Archbishop Wuerl said. "May our nation's new leaders be guided in their decisions with wisdom and compassion and at the heart of all of their decisions may there be a deep respect for and commitment to the sanctity and dignity of all human life and support for the most vulnerable among us."

"My hope and prayer is that our new president will truly treasure and advance the principles that make us who we are as a great nation," said Bishop David A. Zubik of Pittsburgh in a letter to Catholics in his diocese.

"As he spoke to the nation for the first time, our newly-elected president offered a litany of hopes for our country. To each of those hopes, the crowd gathered responded: 'Yes we can!' May that litany also include 'life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness,'" Bishop Zubik said.

Patrick Whelan, president of Catholic Democrats, said his organization "is thrilled that Sen. Obama has been elected to the highest office in the land today, and that Sen. Biden will be our first Catholic vice president."

He added that his group "argued all along" that Obama and Biden "were the candidates that best reflected our Catholic values of hope, personal responsibility and care for the common good."

He said the two Democrats also "best addressed the issues of meeting our energy needs, feeding our families, ensuring access to quality health care, promoting peace and prosperity, and restoring the progress that was made against abortion during the 1990s."

"I am sure, like me, you are disappointed with tonight's results," said a posting on the Catholics for McCain Web site by Billy Valentine, a student at the Franciscan University of Steubenville, in Ohio, and president of Catholic Students for McCain.

Valentine said the Web site will "most likely change in name and become more of a grass-roots issue-advocacy group. We will also start tracking key 2010 races to make sure we elect pro-lifers in key races."

However, he noted that "for the nine different political races I have seriously been involved in over the past two years, only one has resulted in victory. It is tough to take. It is not easy."

He also exhorted readers, "Continue to pray. Continue to be involved. Continue to fight for the unborn."

U.S. President-elect Barack Obama and Vice President-elect Joseph Biden wave after Obama's speech during their election night rally in Chicago Nov. 4.

director of Priests for Life, said in a statement the electorate made "a grave mistake," pointing to a comment Obama made during the campaign that the priest paraphrased by saying that "he does not know when a human being starts to have human rights."

"Governing is about protecting human rights; to do it successfully, you have to know where they come from, and when they begin. The president-elect has already failed that test miserably," Father Pavone said, adding that the pro-life movement will grow in strength.

"We will keep marching toward that

In a posting on dotCommonweal, a blog run by the Catholic magazine Commonweal, journalism professor Paul Moses said: "John F. Kennedy blazed the trail for Catholics. But it has taken nearly 50 years for another Catholic to follow him to victory on a national ticket," with Biden winning the vice presidency.

He noted that Biden, whose hometown is Scranton, Pa., "had to weather some serious criticism from bishops about his views on abortion — and his bad theology on the subject."

Pope sends congratulatory message to Obama

BY CINDY WOODEN
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

VATICAN CITY — Pope Benedict XVI sent a personal message to President-elect Barack Obama Nov. 5, congratulating him and offering his prayers for Obama and for all the people of the United States.

Jesuit Father Federico Lombardi, Vatican spokesman, said that because the message was addressed personally to Obama the Vatican did not plan to publish it.

However, he said, the papal message opened by referring to the "historic occasion" of the election, marking the first time a black man has been elected president of the United States.

The pope congratulated Obama, his wife and family, Father Lombardi said.

"He assured him of his prayers that God would help him with his high responsibilities for his country and for the international community," Father Lombardi said.

The pope also prayed that "the blessing of God would sustain him and the American people so that with all people of good will they could build a world of peace, solidarity and justice," the spokesman said.

Asked if the pope mentioned any specific issues he was concerned about, Father Lombardi responded, "peace, solidarity and justice."

The message to Obama was sent through the office of Mary Ann Glendon, the U.S. ambassador to the Holy See, he said. Cardinal Tarcisio Bertone, Vatican secretary of state, also sent a message.

Father Lombardi said it is likely a formal message also will be sent on the occasion of Obama's Jan. 20 inauguration; in past years, the Vatican custom has been that the pope congratulates a new U.S. president only when he formally takes office.

The Vatican newspaper, L'Osservatore Romano, was published Nov. 5 with an opinion piece headlined "A choice that unites."

"In the end, change occurred. The slogan that accompanied Barack Obama's whole electoral campaign found its expression" in the results of the Nov. 4 election, said the article by Giuseppe Fiorentino.

"As the president-elect underlined in his victory speech in Chicago, America really is the country where anything can happen," a country "able to overcome fractures and divisions that not long ago seemed impossible to heal," it said.

But, the article said, the vote for Obama was "very pragmatic" because he was the "more convincing" candidate for "an electorate needing new hope, especially for a quick economic recovery."

The newspaper said Obama and his supporters know "not everything is roses and flowers," because of the "huge political, social, economic and moral challenges" the United States is facing.

Obama must unite the nation, a process L'Osservatore said will be helped by the concession speech of Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., who referred to Obama as "my president."

Vatican Radio called the election of Obama a "historic day" for the United States and underlined the overwhelmingly positive reaction around the world.

Despite Scranton Bishop Joseph F. Martino's condemnation of the Obama-Biden ticket because of its support for abortion and "Catholics who supported it," Moses said that there, "as in the nation, a majority of Catholics" supported the winning ticket.

"It would appear from the pre-election polls that more than half of American Catholics voted for Barack Obama. How could they do that when their bishops ordered them to vote for John McCain?" said priest-sociologist Father Andrew Greeley in a column in the Chicago Sun-Times daily newspaper.

"In fact, no such order was issued, though some bishops came pretty close to it," he said.

"Some bishops and priests argue that abortion is such a horrible evil that there can be no proportionate reason" to vote for a candidate who supports legal abortion, Father Greeley said.

He argued that view "goes beyond Catholic ethical demands" and said opposition to abortion doesn't "exhaust the moral obligations of the Catholic social ethic. ... Catholics must strive to persuade others by the depth and power of their commitment to life issues."

The work ahead

Chris Korzen, executive director of Catholics United, said his organization will now work "to advance some key legislation with the new administration and the new Congress."

Top priorities include a plan to reduce abortions, as proposed by Obama, the Employee Free Choice Act and universal health care, all of which Korzen called significant justice issues.

Catholics United describes itself as a nonpartisan organization that promotes justice and the common good as expressed in Catholic social teaching.

"We have work to do," said American Life League president Judie Brown.

"I think it's time for the pro-life movement to focus on personhood and stop accommodating the Republican Party. We have to unify around personhood," she said. "We're now waiting for those who have resisted (the idea of personhood for the unborn) to finally decide that maybe they were wrong."

Jack Smith, editor and general manager of The Catholic Key, newspaper of the Diocese of Kansas City-St. Joseph, Mo., simply posted Psalm 145 on his newspaper's blog. It says: "I will praise your name, my king and my God."

He reminded readers in whom they should have trust — regardless of who won the election.

Scholarly works on Jesus offer complementary perspectives

REVIEWED BY BIRAN WELTER
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

Father Gerard Sloyan's "Jesus: Word Made Flesh" and "Jesus: A Portrait" by Jesuit Father Gerald O'Collins offer complementary rather than competing discussions on Jesus.

Both are demanding, scholarly authors; Father Sloyan closely analyzes the New Testament account of Jesus, while Father O'Collins starts with theology before turning to the biblical evidence.

Father O'Collins offers a faith-based approach that often reads like a Sunday homily, making the book slightly more accessible than Father Sloyan's.

He has a sense of the Jesus of faith for whom Christians hunger. He therefore takes a liberal approach with filling in the gaps in the record on Jesus' life.

"Jesus embodied the message of the divine kingdom before preaching it," Father O'Collins writes. "His life at Nazareth expressed in advance the hidden, humble quality of the kingdom."

At this point, he turns to Scripture to find something specific.

Father O'Collins loves to think about the kinds of experiences Jesus must have had. He takes the interesting viewpoint that we can learn about Jesus' early life from the parables, so many of which were agricultural.

Jesus would have witnessed repeatedly and at close range the workings of vineyards and winemaking, sowing and harvesting, and even dishonest management of these operations, as attested to by one of his parables.

This simplicity came through more generally in Jesus' personality and the "hereness and nowness" of his approach. Jesus did not concern himself with history or old feuds, but with the lives of the people he met every day.

His language was "earthly" and therefore accessible to the poor, illiterate people who followed him.

Father O'Collins manages to keep his focus on an intimate portrayal of Jesus that is nonetheless faithful to the church's teachings and to the biblical account.

His faith-based approach allows him to be pastoral with the reader, including the following zinger, which is more about Jesus' followers (and potential followers) than about Jesus himself: "I continue to suspect that it is the significance rather than the fact of these miracles which poses a problem for some or even many people."

Father Sloyan gets his theology about Jesus from a much closer reading of the New Testament witness than Father O'Collins, and this can at times bog things down.

Rather than presenting a coherent vision of Jesus, which is most helpful in the case of Father O'Collins, he gives a coherent vision of the New Testament writings.

In fact, the book is more about the New Testament and how we can interpret its various writings than it is about Jesus. The reader will probably be closer to the Bible at the end of the reading, but not necessarily closer to Christ.

The book does offer some thoughts that can help us more deeply understand Jesus at a personal level, though this closely follows the New Testament perspective, as in the discussion of the Gospel of Mark: "His (Jesus') business was to proclaim God his father, not himself or the redemptive act, if indeed he knew anything of it beforehand."

The author has interesting things to say about Paul's vision of Jesus. This is a refreshing discussion, as Father Sloyan pushes the reader none too gently past the 1970s' Jesus-is-your-best-friend spirituality, and invokes the view of "Christ now in glory with the Father, with whom every baptized member in all the churches is in an intimate personal relation."

Father Sloyan holds doctorates in both theology and Scripture, so he naturally bases his theology on a close reading of the various biblical Greek writings.

This makes for very energetic scholarship and advanced theology, as at a third-year university level. But it doesn't offer much to those who don't have a more basic training in the Bible or theology.

In this case, the more pastoral and freely written book by Father O'Collins does the trick.

Welter is a freelance contributor to the B.C. Catholic, the newspaper of the Archdiocese of Vancouver, British Columbia, and is studying for his doctorate in systematic theology.

Making the most of God's gifts in our lives

BY JEFF HENSLEY
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

What a curious bunch of Scriptures. Each of them would be meat for a session of "lectio divina," prayerful contemplation and mulling of each line of each passage.

But taken together? Hmm.

The obvious praise of the value of a good — no, make that excellent — wife in the Proverbs passage can't be passed up, especially as I approach the 40th anniversary of my marriage to my own excellent wife. She is a blessing to me in every way.

The references to industriousness are applicable. She is a hard worker at home and in her job as a teacher of English as a Second Language.

And that's only one environment in which "she reaches out her hand to the poor," something she has done her whole life. She is indeed "an unfailing prize."

Thessalonians and Matthew point to our need to remain vigilant concerning the Lord's return and his expectations that we will be both faithful and fruitful. Both suggest that any of us who want to wait about our situations or lack of resources or hard luck, ought to think again.

God expects us to do the best we can with what we have.

All these images and admonitions, taken together, bring to mind a close friend of ours who seems to fit those Proverbs 31 descriptions of the excellent wife. But only recently, in her long and somewhat tortuous life, has she found the counterpart of an excellent husband.

The meager resources that life handed her — the equivalent of the one talent — she invested wisely, turning a skill into a successful business that has allowed her to travel widely and support quite generously not only her aging mother, but also many Catholic charities and ministries.

Her example indeed makes all these seemingly disparate Scriptures hang together, telling a story for the rest of us, an edifying one, that would have us turn our eyes to the Lord to confirm the first line of the Psalm for this week: "Blessed are you who fear the Lord, who walk in his ways!"

Questions:

Do you know someone who seems to have persevered and overcome great odds while living a godly life? What can you do to make the most of God's gifts in your own life?

Stories of 'secret sisters' shared with those who helped

Commitment comes to life in television documentary

BY PATRICIA BARTOS
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

PITTSBURGH — Theirs is the great untold story of modern Europe — the "secret sisters," who for more than 40 years under communism took their vows, lived out their calling and kept the faith alive, all in isolation and in constant fear of discovery.

The depth of their commitment as part of the underground church will come to life on television screens next year through a documentary in production by NewGroup Media in South Bend, Ind.

Titled "Interrupted Lives: Catholic Sisters Under European Communism," the program is funded in part by the U.S. bishops' Catholic Communication Campaign.

"What strikes me is that we all know about the Holocaust, which lasted for six years, but what about these 43 years of suffering?" asked Sister Margaret Nacke. "No one knows this story."

She and Sister Mary Savoie, both St. Joseph Sisters of Concordia, Kan., have collected some 3,000 oral histories from sisters in eight countries over the last 15 years. The oral histories formed the basis for the documentary and for "Faces of Faith," a traveling exhibit they take to religious communities.

The exhibit can be viewed online at www.csjkansas.org, under "News."

"The sisters show what it was to be faithful to the church and God and to continue their ministry wherever they were," Sister Savoie said.

The documentary "really tells the story of the Catholic Church under communism and tells how these people are an example for us," she said.

Their stories are stark, dramatic and very moving, telling of sisters imprisoned in concentration camps, sent to hard labor in Siberia, beaten for teaching and practicing the faith.

Earlier this year, 21 sisters from Slovakia, Hungary, Romania, Ukraine and Poland gathered at the Villa Maria Community Center in Villa Maria, Pa., with some 30 U.S. members of the International Forum for Sisters, formed in the 1990s to respond to the needs of religious communities emerging from the underground.

Sisters in the United States have the support of their community, said Sister Dia Stasiuk of the Basilian order in Lviv, Ukraine, while those living under communism "didn't know who they could trust."

In the early '90s, she said, for the first time since the fall of communism, "the sisters in Ukraine came together, 90 of them, and began recognizing each other. It was 'Oh, you're a sister too?' We knew each other only in small groups, and only by first names, for safety."

The sisters could not even tell their own families of their vocations, for fear of endangering them.

Sister Terez Muranyi took her first vows in secret in 1977 in Romania, as an Eastern Catholic member of the Sisters of Social Service.

"My family did not know anything till 1993," she said.

When the news reached her mother,

Videographer Douglas Thomas of NewGroup Media films an actress portraying Sister Anne Lehner, a Sister of Social Service, who escaped from Communist-controlled Hungary into Austria in 1952.

"she was very happy," Sister Muranyi said. "She wanted to become a nun when she was young and was happy that I continued her vocation. I was so happy to invite my parents to my 25th."

Sister Paula Cicos of the Mother of God Sisters in Romania had been a sister for six years, living at home and working in a biological research lab. Approaching her final vows, she told her parents.

"They cried a lot," she said. "It was not easy. They came with me in secret to a house as I took my vows. They gave me a blessing, crying."

The U.S. sisters at the Villa Maria meeting were among more than 200 who helped their East and Central European counterparts by establishing pastoral centers, updating libraries, teaching English and hosting leadership workshops.

They saw the chance for real collaboration and didn't want to lose the relationships they had begun with the European sisters, said Sister Veronica Ternovacz of the Humility of Mary order at Villa Maria, one of those early volunteers and current head of the International Forum for Sisters.

At the summer gathering they studied together Pope Benedict XVI's encyclical, "Deus Caritas Est" ("God Is Love"), while engaging in dialogue and nurturing new friendships.

Romania's Sister Muranyi participated in the forum from the very beginning.

"We knew a little of our own world but not of the suffering of others," she said. "We knew how to suffer, how to be brave, to pray, but not how to live in community life, how to form young sisters in religious life."

Vincentian Sister Valentyna Ryabushko of Ukraine, at age 26 the youngest sister attending the Villa Maria dialogue, listened eagerly to the stories of the older sisters.

"On my visit here I saw sisters who opened their hearts, who lived under communism through these times," she said. "Our vocations were bought by the price of their faith."

ARCHIVAL ANECDOTA

ARCHIVES PHOTO

Pictured is St. Michael the Archangel Church in Gastonia in 1958. It was one of several churches in the Diocese of Charlotte to be built through funds provided by St. Katherine Drexel, who toured the churches in 1904.

Father Thomas Price: Ordained in 1886, the "Tar Heel Apostle" was North Carolina's first native-born diocesan priest. He was assigned for a period to serve missions in the N.C. mountains.

In 1892, he climbed Mt. Mitchell and offered Mass at the top for the conversion of North Carolina. Eventually he helped create the American Catholic Foreign Mission Society (also known as Maryknoll) and died in 1919 while serving as a missionary in China.

Father Price's sister, Sister Catherine Price, joined the Sisters of Mercy and was the superior of those stationed in Salisbury where they managed Sacred Heart School.

The canonization cause for Father Price is in its early stages and both the Diocese of Raleigh and Maryknoll are currently compiling information and gathering testimony.

Both the book and the movie, "The Tar Heel Apostle," can be found in the Media Center in the diocesan Pastoral Center.

St. Katherine Drexel: Mother Drexel, canonized Oct. 1, 2000, came to Charlotte March 19, 1904 to tour the churches she helped build using her family inheritance. St. Peter Church in Charlotte, St. Michael Church in Gastonia and Belmont Abbey's basilica are a few of the beneficiaries of her generosity.

St. Katherine was very much ahead of her time in the push for desegregated churches. Both St. Peter Church and the Belmont Abbey Basilica were constructed in 1893 under the condition that at least one pew be reserved for African-Americans.

Servant of God Francis J. Parater: A native of Richmond, Va., Frank Parater discerned God's call to the priesthood while attending Belmont Abbey College seminary in 1917. He became a seminarian of the Diocese of Richmond and was sent to study in Rome at the North American College, where he died in 1920.

He was declared a Servant of God in 2002 by the bishop of Richmond and his cause for canonization is under investigation.

Archbishop Fulton J. Sheen: Archbishop Sheen celebrated Mass at St. Patrick Cathedral March 17, 1974 while visiting Charlotte for a preaching conference. He visited Our Lady of Grace Church in Greensboro Nov. 14, 1976 to give the address at the dedication of the parish activity center.

The diocesan phase of Archbishop Sheen's canonization cause closed February 2007 and is now under the Vatican's Congregation for Saints' Causes.

The Diocese of Charlotte's Media Center has episodes of Archbishop Sheen's TV show, "Life is Worth Living," on both DVD and VHS.

Blessed Mother Teresa: On June 13, 1995, Blessed Mother Teresa visited Charlotte to open a convent and participate in a prayer service at the Charlotte Coliseum.

She met Bishop Emeritus William G. Curlin while he was a priest in Washington, D.C. in the 1970s, and the two became life-long friends.

Mother Teresa died Sept. 5, 1997. Her beatification occurred in Rome Oct. 19, 2003.

Perspectives

A collection of columns, editorials and viewpoints

Are we in danger of losing our heavenly homes?

Amid housing and economic crisis, we have bigger concerns

There's a story about a missionary who, after 40 years in Africa, was heading home aboard a ship with Teddy Roosevelt, who was returning after a three-day safari in Africa.

Roosevelt was welcomed home with a parade. Nobody was on the dock to welcome the missionary, and he later stormed into his bishop's office, demanding to know why.

"Because you're not home yet," the bishop reminded him.

The housing crisis. Foreclosures. People losing their homes. These concerns affect many of us, but like the missionary we forget this life is temporary, that earth is only our temporary home.

Our permanent home, where we will spend eternity, will be either heaven or hell. Yet we seem more concerned about losing our earthly dwellings than we are about losing our permanent homes.

And the choices we make today will affect where we reside in eternity.

Jesus and the church say we are all brothers and sisters. But how do we treat each other? For too many of us, our lives are spent not helping, but putting and keeping others down.

Some of us believe that simply because of one's skin color, a person is inferior and undesirable, his culture backward. Instead of seeing the positives of other cultures, we put them down as primitive and non-contributory to society.

Some of us have higher educations and believe those who do not are less intelligent and inferior. We even rate each other not by our degrees but by the schools from which we obtain them.

Some of us buy houses in particular sections of town, primarily as a status symbol so we can be around those like us. We believe those who live in other sections are a lower class of people.

We even build gates and guarded entrances to our neighborhoods to keep them out; otherwise, our neighborhoods and property values will go down. And when two or more "undesirable" families move in, "for sale" signs go up.

Some of us get high-paying jobs with responsibility and believe our employees are mindless individuals there simply to do our will. We start to believe we are something special, truly deserving of other's respect and honor.

We fail to see how arrogant, egotistical and insufferable we are.

Some of us go to church every Sunday, join commissions and committees, and start believing we are tight with God — certainly head and shoulders above others. We believe those who don't come to church are heathens who will incur the wrath of our God.

Jesus considers each person a child of God. He looks down on no one. In fact, Jesus searched out, ministered to and helped those who the "higher ups" in society considered worthless and undesirable.

Jesus tells us to never put ourselves above anybody else for any reason — regardless of color, economic status, educational achievement, position or title. We are strengthened when we acknowledge our differences yet treat one another as children of God, as brothers and sisters.

Jesus did not have nor seek wealth, high position or a fancy home. His life's purpose was to do God's will and to lead others to heaven; and he calls all of us to do the same.

If we pattern our lives after Jesus — if we mirror his achievements and accomplishments instead of those of sports figures, rock stars, celebrities, politicians and those we put on pedestals — two things will happen.

First, the world will become a better place. Second, we won't be in danger of not getting into heaven.

We are all created in God's image and likeness. God is a spirit; we have our spiritual sides. God is eternal; so are we and we will have eternal life. And where we will spend it depends on how we live.

We must choose, for God does not make us obey. He tells us what is right and wrong, what is his way and what is the devil's. Do we want to get closer to God, or closer to the devil?

Taking the latter path will get us wealth, title, and that expensive home in a certain neighborhood. But it also will put us in great danger of losing our home in heaven.

So ask yourself: "Am I in danger of losing my heavenly home?"

Deacon Todd is a permanent deacon at St. Gabriel Church in Charlotte.

What's essential for the new administration?

Moral vision is essential for economy to serve all people fairly

Once again the airwaves are quiet, blessedly free of the snarling accusations — from taxation to treason — hurled by candidates at every level during an extended campaign season, the length of which approached defining eternity.

Now within this quiet zone, when rational thought can replace election frenzy, the new national administration will be developing the agenda for the country.

There will be talk of "healing," of "coming together," of "engaging in bipartisanship."

The first step may be to define precisely what is meant by unity.

Obviously, by the fact that there are two political parties and three branches of government, the system is meant to function on an adversarial basis. But adversarial does not mean antagonistic.

A starting point is a thought often attributed to St. Augustine: "In essentials, unity; in nonessentials, liberty; in all things, charity."

Augustinian or not, it makes sense for a new agenda.

So what is essential?

The dictionary defines "essential" as fundamental; central, absolutely necessary, of the utmost importance, indispensable. The task, then, is to determine those things which we hold to be so important, so absolutely necessary to our understanding of who we are.

That is answered by our faith: the sacredness of human life and the dignity of the human person. Everything must be done within that understanding, the foundation of a moral vision for society. This belief is the foundation of all the principles of our social teaching.

The value of human life is threatened by abortion, euthanasia, cloning, embryonic stem-cell research and the death penalty.

Catholic teaching also calls on us to work to avoid war. Nations must protect the right to life by finding increasingly effective ways to prevent conflicts and resolve them by peaceful means.

We believe that every person is precious, that people are more important than things and that the measure of every institution is whether it threatens or enhances the life and dignity of the human person.

The economic system of the United States — if not the primary issue for everyone — definitely ranked high among issues in the election of the president and Congress. With the economy so high on the agenda, a good document to put in the briefcases of the new administration is "Economic Justice for All."

This scripturally based pastoral letter by the U.S. bishops from 1986 is as current as it was then.

"The pre-eminent role of the United States in an increasingly interdependent global economy is a central sign of our times," it said, laying out three pillars of forming an economic policy:

- What does it do for people?
- What does it do to people?
- What does it do to the less well-off?

"Economic Justice for All" is not outdated by the advent of the Internet, NAFTA or financial derivatives on Wall Street. We just have a better way today to accomplish greed, selfishness and an unbalanced accumulation of wealth.

"A critical pillar to market competition and free markets did break down," former Federal Reserve chairman Alan Greenspan told Congress. "I still do not fully understand why it happened."

Here's a clue: Look to those three pillars proposed by "Economic Justice for All." They are prophetic.

There has been more than enough mindless babble in the last two years leading up to a new administration. The bishops' pastoral has this timely advice: "Strengthening common moral vision is essential if the economy is to serve all people more fairly."

How to move forward now

Above all else, holiness is needed to effect change, end abortion

More than 30 years ago, the United States entered into one of the most morally-offensive periods of its history.

Since Jan. 22, 1973, when the Supreme Court legalized abortion with Roe v. Wade, about 4,000 innocent human beings have been legally slaughtered each day in our country.

The fight to defend the rights of these innocent persons has been driven primarily by lay Catholics since the very beginning.

Catholic Church leaders have always taught that the killing of an innocent, unborn child is morally reprehensible and intrinsically evil.

The U.S. bishops, particularly in their documents "Living the Gospel of Life" and "Forming Consciences for Faithful Citizenship," have attempted to guide Catholics to know and understand not only the teaching — but the absolute moral imperative — that we have to legally protect and defend the unborn.

While we have most recently seen some very clear teaching on the distinctions of intrinsic evils, and the hierarchy of degrees of gravity among intrinsic evils, many people are still unclear that we are all called to actively oppose the preeminent intrinsic evil of abortion and infanticide, and the variants of those evils, even while other issues may seem to be very important.

For many years it was seen as politically incorrect to speak out forcefully and, as a result, many Catholics have not seen the clear direction, even though it was there to be found.

As a result, with the recent election, our nation now faces the very real possibility that all restrictions on abortion will be eliminated despite that majority opinion that abortions should be rare or nonexistent. The dangers to the unborn have increased.

The very real possibility of the Freedom of Choice Act passing and being signed into law looms large, and the abortion industry, with its very deep pockets, will do everything to bring that about.

Of course, a necessary Freedom of Conscience Act for health care workers is not on the horizon, even though it would assist those who do not want to participate in abortions.

The discouraging reality is that numerous Catholics, many of whom attend Mass regularly, have voted to empower those who may increase the availability and funding of abortions.

These Catholics have become so confused about the issue that they could not separate the intrinsic evil from other important issues, and they may have justified their votes by using illogical rationalizations.

What are faithful Catholics to do in the face of such confusion and sadness? How do we respond to such a wonton disregard for human life? Should we become politically active? Write letters? March?

These are all perfectly acceptable responses that are necessary to continue the good work faithful Catholics have done to protect the unborn. But will any of them alone bring about the true change that is needed? No.

While engaging in public debate and being active in the defense of the unborn are acceptable and encouraged, one thing in particular must continue and increase. It was the answer I gave to a recent question: "How do we move forward and respond now?" The answer: holiness.

Holiness is not easy. It is not consoling in the typical sense of the word. It is not immediate. It is, however, the ultimate answer to evil.

Work we must, but holiness is the one thing we must increase and which must inspire and animate our work. Only when Jesus is brought into an evil situation will evil depart. Only holiness will begin the change needed in the decaying moral fabric of our country.

No anger nor sadness, violence nor hatred, despair nor disgust will change our land. Only holiness will do, for where there is holiness, there is change.

One saintly individual can have a great impact on the world, and each of us, by virtue of our baptism, is called to be holy. Remember the impact that one little woman living in Calcutta, India, had and still has on the world.

Blessed Mother Teresa's life of holiness has inspired many around the world to serve those in dire need. If this one woman could make such a difference, just think if all of us strive to fulfill our baptismal calls to holiness.

So you may ask, "Where does it begin? How do I become holy?" or think, "I'm no saint!"

No we are not saints, but saints we can and must become.

So where do we turn? To our knees before the Blessed Sacrament in prayer, before the priest in confession, before the altar in worthy reception of holy Communion will we begin to become holy.

Also, by studying sacred Scripture and the teachings of our faith, and by putting that knowledge into action in our lives.

If you care about our society's moral decay and want to make a difference, begin anew by living holy lives — we will make an eternal affect on our country. It does not begin with action, it begins with prayer.

Blessed Mother Teresa did not awaken in the morning and simply get to work, nor do her Sisters — the Missionaries of Charity — do so today. Rather, she first attended Mass, then made a holy hour each day.

Then, she prayed the rosary on the way to the different places where she would work. Inspired by and influenced by the love of Jesus, she encountered him in the streets and served his needs.

It was her closeness to Jesus and Mary, his mother, that caused Mother Teresa to be holy and do the things she did — and thus have an affect on the whole world.

We don't need to spend our whole day on our knees, but rather we should start there and bring that prayer into everything we do. If we truly want to make a change in our society, a change that is of God's design and plan, then we need to strive for holiness.

There is no quick answer to the evil that has gripped our nation for 35 years. When mankind begins to view some individuals as less than human, evil is the result, and the unborn children, innocent in their mothers' wombs, are reduced to non-humans.

This is an evil that requires a change of heart by the people of our nation before it is eradicated, and that is a big task. This is where God comes in.

We can do nothing on our own, but we can "do all things in him who strengthens me."

In our own piece of this great land, we can begin to make a difference by striving toward holiness. Let us resolve today, at this moment, to set aside all political anger and argument and do what we are called to do by Christ — to be holy.

This is the call of the Gospels, and to fulfill this call we will be living and spreading the Gospel of Life.

Pope says experience of suffering needed to understand beauty of life

The Pope Speaks

POPE
BENEDICT XVI

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — The beauty and promise of life cannot be understood without the experience of suffering, Pope Benedict XVI said.

At his Nov. 5 weekly general audience, the pope focused on St. Paul's emphasis on the resurrection as the key to understanding Christ and the eternal life to which all people are called.

The death and resurrection of Jesus have important consequences for the way Christians are called to live, he said.

"We are called to participate with our whole being in the entire event of the death and resurrection of Christ," Pope Benedict said. "We have, the apostle says, died with Christ, and we believe we will live with him."

The affirmation that those who have been baptized into Christ's death will rise with him implies that there will be suffering, but that suffering and death will not have the last word, the pope said.

Here is the text of the pope's audience remarks in English.

Dear Brothers and Sisters,

In our continuing catechesis on the teaching of St. Paul, we now turn to his proclamation of the resurrection.

In preaching Jesus Christ risen from the dead, Paul was concerned to "hand on" what he himself had "received" from the Apostles (cf. 1 Cor 15:3).

He proclaims not only the fact of the resurrection, but its vital significance: in Christ, who died and rose for us, we have been saved, made righteous in the sight of God. The resurrection reveals Jesus' true identity as the eternal Son of God and Lord of the living and the dead.

We, for our part, are called to become fully configured to him in the mystery of his passover from death to life. Our present sufferings thus become a sharing in Christ's own suffering and death, while the hope of the resurrection even now draws us toward the fullness of life with all the saints in his Kingdom.

Salvation, Paul tells us, comes from confessing with our lips that Jesus is Lord, and believing in our hearts that God raised him from the dead (cf. Rom 10:9).

With the Apostle, then, let us strive ever more fully, in faith and hope, "to know Jesus Christ and the power of his resurrection" (cf. Phil 3:10).

Melissa Lujano and Melissa Meza prepare crosses — which bear the names of people who have been killed — at Immaculate Heart of Mary Church in Chicago prior to a Mass Oct. 27 to remember victims of violence. As of Oct. 24, the Sun-Times newspaper reported that Chicago posted 426 killings this year, compared with 417 in New York and 302 in Los Angeles.

'To listen with loving care'

As murders mount in Chicago, Mass memorializes victims of violence

BY PAM DeFIGLIO
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

CHICAGO — As Chicago surpassed New York and Los Angeles for the number of murders this year, Catholics in the city attended an annual memorial Mass for victims of violence at Immaculate Heart of Mary Church in the Back of the Yards neighborhood on Chicago's South Side.

Many of those in attendance lost loved ones a few years ago but the pain is still fresh.

Six years after her son was killed, Lucida Montelongo struggles with the loss every day.

"I couldn't cry for the first two years," she recalled. "At first, I wanted to kill. Anger is normal. It's mixed emotions."

"But as time passes by, your emotions change," said Montelongo after the Oct. 27 memorial Mass for victims of violence.

After an assailant shot 26-year-old Arthur Montelongo to death in 2002, Lucida Montelongo lost interest in talking to people and performing the routines of daily life, like running a household. With time, the intensity of the emotions diminished, she said.

But Montelongo, her husband and her four remaining children still wrestle through their grief with tears, a lack of joy in life and what she describes as feeling "emotionally lost."

To cope, she attends monthly healing circles put on by the Precious Blood Ministry of Reconciliation, a ministry for offenders, at-risk youths and people who have lost loved ones to violence.

A few days before Auxiliary Bishop Gustavo Garcia-Siller of Chicago came to Immaculate Heart of Mary Church to celebrate the annual memorial Mass, the Chicago Sun-Times newspapers reported the city's 2008 murder toll had reached 426 as of Oct. 24, compared with 417 in New York and 302 in Los Angeles.

Before the Mass began, volunteers invited Massgoers to write the names of loved ones lost to violence on 10-inch-tall white wooden crosses.

Precious Blood Father David Kelly, one of the priests who founded the ministry, welcomed participants and said, "The violence has not stopped, but we work for peace."

Bishop Garcia-Siller delivered his homily in Spanish and English. He expressed worry that the nation's economic instability means more violence will occur.

"But we can let Jesus find an answer to it," he said. "Jesus was able to find through his death an answer to life and give us hope, because he knew we would face many moments of death."

More than 200 people listened as he acknowledged his own angry human reaction when he hears about acts of violence.

"We get tired and angry — we become like the offenders — filled with violence," he said. "I can feel it in myself when I hear these stories, filled with feelings that are not from God. And I have to turn back to God."

"This violence is taking our love, so let us love one another more. Let us pray more and listen more," he said.

After the homily, two young women slowly carried a large wooden cross, about 5 feet high, up the center aisle of the church and positioned it on a black fabric screen placed to one side of the sanctuary.

Congregants filed up to the screen and affixed the small white crosses bearing the names of their lost ones. Many also placed photos of the deceased on display shelves.

Some shed tears and were comforted by relatives; others remained solemn.

After the Mass, Bishop Garcia-Siller praised Precious Blood Ministry's work with survivors, explaining, "We need to listen with loving care to people's stories, and not to judge who was right and who was wrong."

Such caring is very healing for those who have suffered violent loss, he said.

Earlier in October, Cardinal Justin Rigali of Philadelphia led a holy hour for peace in his city at Christ the King Church in northeast Philadelphia. At the cardinal's urging, similar prayer services took place in other churches throughout the archdiocese.

The cardinal chose to spend the hour at Christ the King Church because it was the home parish of police Sgt. Patrick McDonald, whose funeral Mass he had celebrated there in September.

He was joined by Philadelphia Mayor Michael Nutter along with hundreds of people on their knees "expressing our profound dependency on God," Cardinal Rigali said.

"What cannot be accomplished by our own power, God can accomplish by his. He can build up a city of peace and justice," he said.

"The power of prayer opens hearts and doors to peace in our city. This has been the prayer and aspiration of our hearts this evening," said the cardinal.

Hundreds more joined the cardinal spiritually at 105 parishes across the city, where Catholic churches were opened to remember McDonald and four other police officers killed in Philadelphia in the past two years.

The faithful also remembered the officers' families and prayed for the safety of all police officers and firefighters "who offer up so much for our safety and tranquility," the cardinal said.

HUMBLE SERVANT

Jesuit Father Martin McDermott prays the rosary with migrant workers in the courtyard of St. Joseph Church in Beirut, Lebanon, Oct. 19. The U.S. priest, who arrived in Lebanon in 1971, has been serving the migrant community since 2000.

Migrant workers in Lebanon find friend, advocate in American Jesuit BEIRUT, Lebanon (CNS) — For hundreds of Lebanon's Asian and African migrant workers, Sunday Mass at St. Joseph Church in Beirut is a respite from a mundane, lonely existence.

There, they have found a spiritual leader, advocate and friend in an American Jesuit.

"The Lord especially loves servants because he came to this world as a servant. Don't ever think that God forgets you. He sees whether you have a generous or stingy employer; whether you have a kind or mean employer," Jesuit Father Martin McDermott said during a recent Sunday homily.

"Pray for them (your employers) always, and offer up your work. Not because they might treat you better but so they may stand better before the Lord. This is called love. You can be the cause of their salvation," he said.

The 75-year-old priest, who has a doctorate in Islamic studies, came to Lebanon in 1971 and has been serving the migrant community full time since he retired in 2000 as director of the Oriental Library at the Jesuit-run St. Joseph University in Beirut.

Lebanon's migrant worker population is estimated at 220,000 to 250,000, the majority of whom are women working as housemaids.

"Most of the employers are not what they should be," Father McDermott told Catholic News Service. "Within the house they have complete power."

Mayline Madamba, 26, from Isabella, Philippines, assists every Sunday at Father McDermott's English Mass, which is always nearly filled to capacity with some 500 migrant workers.

"Working in another country, it's so hard. We are far from our family," said Madamba. "We can always rely on Father Martin. He gives us spiritual and moral support and always enlightens us. He tells us to pray for the people we're working for."

During the 1980s, Father McDermott learned that migrant workers often were treated badly and got into trouble, so he started working with nuns from the Daughters of Charity who were ministering to maids.

The energetic priest now is widely known throughout the migrant community for his advocacy on their behalf. He came upon his first case when he was visited by a Philippine maid who was pregnant after she was raped by her employer, a prominent businessman.

She was being pressured to have an abortion, but refused. Father McDermott found a lawyer to work on her case for free.

The maid named her baby Martin. Father McDermott later heard of at least two more cases in which the same prominent businessman had sexually assaulted maids.

"Unfortunately, there are many flaws in the system," said Father McDermott. "The worst cases we don't hear about, when maids fall out of buildings."

Father McDermott has expanded his migrant worker ministry to Lebanon's prisons. Accompanied by a sister from the Order of Jesus and Mary and a volunteer who plays the guitar and sings, he celebrates Mass at one of four different prisons each week.

"Even in the hardest circumstances you can have deep joy," he often advises the prisoners.

Father Greeley hospitalized after suffering skull fracture in fall

CHICAGO (CNS) — Father Andrew Greeley, a Chicago archdiocesan priest who is a well-known sociologist and novelist, was in critical but stable condition Nov. 10 after being hospitalized for a skull fracture.

The Chicago Sun-Times daily newspaper reported that the priest, who is 80, fell to the ground after getting out of a cab Nov. 7.

The paper said his jacket got stuck in the door of the cab and as the cab began to leave he fell. Father Greeley hit his head, suffering a skull fracture.

He was taken to the emergency room at Advocate Lutheran General Hospital, where physicians implanted a monitor in his skull "to gauge pressure on his brain," the paper reported.

Roberta Wilk, the priest's assistant at the National Opinion Research Center at the University of Chicago, told Catholic News Service Nov. 10 his vital signs were good and that two or three hours after he was admitted to the hospital his condition was upgraded from critical to critical but stable.

Father Greeley is a research associate at the National Opinion Research Center and is a professor of sociology at the University of Arizona, where he teaches one semester a year. He is a respected scholar whose current research focuses on the sociology of religion.

He is the author of more than 50 best-selling novels and more than 100 works of nonfiction; his writing has been translated into 12 languages. In his novels he attempts to convey the wisdom of the love and grace of God operate in the world and the church.

He has received numerous awards, including the 2006 Campion Award given by America magazine on a regular basis to a noted Christian person in letters, and the 1993 U.S. Catholic Award, recognizing him for furthering the cause of women in the church.

FROM THE VATICAN

German-born pope says he still feels pain of Kristallnacht

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — German-born Pope Benedict XVI said he still feels “pain for what happened” in his homeland in 1938 when Nazi mobs went on the rampage against Jews, an event that became known as Kristallnacht.

The pope was 11 years old when, on the night of Nov. 9-10, 1938, “the Nazi fury against the Jews was unleashed in Germany.”

Marking the 70th anniversary of Kristallnacht — German for Night of the Broken Glass — the pope asked Catholics to pray for the Jewish victims of the Holocaust, and he condemned all forms of anti-Semitism.

Pope Benedict spoke about the anniversary during his midday Angelus address Nov. 9 at the Vatican.

During Kristallnacht throughout Germany “stores, offices, homes and synagogues were attacked and numerous people were killed, initiating the systematic and violent persecution of German Jews that concluded with the Shoah,” or Holocaust, the pope said.

“I still feel pain for what happened in that tragic circumstance whose memory must serve to ensure that similar horrors are never repeated again and that we commit ourselves, at every level, to fighting anti-Semitism and discrimination, especially by educating the younger generations in respect and mutual acceptance,” the pope said.

He also asked Catholics to pray for the victims of the Nazis and “to join me in showing deep solidarity with the Jewish world.”

The obligation to remember the Holocaust and to educate future generations in respect for all peoples also was reaffirmed by the secretary of the Vatican’s Congregation for Catholic Education at a Nov. 6 meeting of European education ministers.

Nov. 14, Dec. 5, 7-9 p.m. The recollection will be directed by a priest of Opus Dei, a personal prelature of the Catholic Church. There will be opportunities for confession. For more information contact Joe Ignacio at (704) 752-7155 or jremy.ignacio@gmail.com.

Poverty, war keep child mortality rates high, says Vatican official

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — While infant and child mortality rates have been slashed by more than half over the past 50 years, nearly 10 million children still die each year, said a Vatican official.

“We are still far from satisfactorily accomplishing the fourth Millennium Development Goal” to reduce child mortality, said Cardinal Javier Lozano Barragan, president of the Pontifical Council for Health Care Ministry.

The U.N. goals, established in 2000 and intended to be reached by 2015, address issues such as hunger, education and poverty.

Cardinal Lozano said that 4 million newborns die within the first month from a combination of infectious diseases, malnutrition and poverty. While poverty remains the primary reason children contract diseases, armed conflict also has killed more than 2 million children and injured 6 million in the last decade, the cardinal said.

Children born in industrialized nations are not immune from poverty, he said, as one in six children in wealthier countries lives below the poverty line.

The cardinal spoke at a Nov. 11 press conference outlining an upcoming congress sponsored by the health care council. More than 40 experts were to discuss at the Nov. 13-15 international congress how the church can address the pastoral and spiritual needs of sick children and their families.

In response to a journalist’s question concerning U.S. President-elect Barack Obama’s support of embryonic stem-cell research, the cardinal said embryonic stem cells “are good for nothing.”

Experiments and research using embryonic stem cells have not produced any positive results or potential cures, he said. Instead, scientists have discovered success and real therapeutic promise from adult stem cells and umbilical-cord blood.

He said therapies and research using stem cells must follow the same ethical criteria used with organ transplants — neither the donor nor the recipient’s lives must be put at risk.

Armed men kidnap two nuns who work with Somali refugees in Kenya

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Two Italian nuns, both in their 60s, were kidnapped Nov. 10 in northeastern Kenya near the border with Somalia, the Vatican newspaper reported.

L'Osservatore Romano identified the nuns as Sister Caterina Giraudo, 67, and Sister Maria Teresa Oliviero, 61, both from Cuneo, Italy, where their religious order, the Contemplative Missionary Movement of Father Charles de Foucauld, is based.

The women had been working for years with Somali refugees in Kenya.

Members of the Kenya Red Cross Society told authorities the nuns were taken by a group of armed men, who also stole three vehicles.

Father Pino Isoardi, head of the Contemplative Missionary Movement, told Vatican Radio that the nuns, like all the members of the group, “share their lives with the poor. We don’t have any big structures. We welcome into our homes the sick, the aged, people who are starving.”

As of midafternoon Nov. 10, the kidnappers had not been in contact with the congregation, he said.

Father Isoardi said he hoped that in Kenya “the elders, who have authority in that area, are able to make contact” with the kidnappers and arrange the sisters’ release.

The Contemplative Missionary Movement, founded in Italy in the mid-1950s, is made up of religious who live in small communities in the midst of slums, refugee camps and other areas of great poverty.

Stained glass can open a person to God, says artist panels in two other windows. In one, Jesus holds the bread at the Last Supper as St. Peter and St. John look at him in awe. Mary and St. John stand on either side of the crucifix in another window.

Humphrey and Steffel plan to add the bottom panels, with their floral designs and names of the windows, by the end of November. They didn't remove the original clear glass, which protects the stained glass from the elements and provides additional insulation.

The three windows adorning the church's day chapel area were planned when the church was built last year.

"Stained-glass windows tell a story" and can aid a person's prayer as the individual meditates on the scenes depicted, said Father Larry LoMonaco, pastor.

He and parishioners chose the windows' theme, "St. John the Evangelist and his role in our salvation," Father LoMonaco said. "He was there for the Last Supper and the Crucifixion — key events in our salvation."

Sister Couture, a stained-glass artist for 29 years, designed the windows. She, Resos and fellow artisan Garrett Baron, created them at Sisters of St. Joseph Architectural Stained Glass in St. Augustine, Fla.

They're not finished with St. John the Evangelist Church yet. A round window in the same area has four triangular clear-glass panes separated by crossbars.

"A parishioner saw the new windows and wrote a check on the spot" to pay for Sister Couture to create stained-glass inserts representing the four evangelists, Father LoMonaco said. These may be in place by Christmas.

There are no plans to replace the church's nine other clear-glass windows.

Creating art

From the time the client approves the design, it takes about a month to create a window, according to Sister Couture.

The techniques go back centuries. For instance, the same type of paint used on St. John the Evangelist Church's windows is the same type of paint used in churches in Europe in the 1700s.

The paint is applied to the glass, which is then fired (baked) in a kiln. To create dimension, such as facial contours and folds in clothing, successive layers of paint are applied and the glass is fired after each application.

Sister Couture runs Sisters of St. Joseph Architectural Stained Glass and designs the windows, mostly for churches. She and her crew have worked in some 250 churches around the world and helped restore churches damaged or destroyed by Hurricane Katrina.

The studio also created a stained-glass window in 2001 for a memorial in New York City commemorating those who were lost in the Sept. 11, 2001 terrorist attack on the World Trade Center. The window is now part of a national shrine in St. Francis of Assisi Church in Manhattan.

Sister Couture also gives programs on the spirituality of the arts in sacred spaces. With a background in psychology and counseling, Sister Couture once ran gerontology and oncology units in hospitals. Stained glass began as her hobby. Eventually she taught classes in the art, including at her alma mater, Flagler College in St. Augustine.

"Part of (the Sisters of St. Joseph) mission statement is that art is essential to life," Sister Couture said. "Art within a sacred space can open a person to the presence of God."

"People stand in awe of a stained-glass window," she said. "There's not much talking. They listen and they watch, and isn't that an element of contemplation?"

Windows provide an opening to ministry, Sister Couture said.

"Our main focus is ministry to whomever we meet," she said. "As Sisters of St. Joseph, the windows become part of the avenue on the journey to God. You stop and listen if someone wants to ask you something.

You focus on the person."

During their work on Hurricane Katrina-devastated churches, she said, people would come into the churches to watch the work, but would then begin to talk about what they had been through.

At that point, Sister Couture would sit down and listen to their stories.

"When a parish accepts us, we take it as a call and journey with them," she said. "If you're dealing with sacred space, you have to come to it from a sacred perspective. People come to a sacred space to be changed and healed."

Kloiber-Healy Memorial Golf Classic

Saturday, November 22

Olde Sycamore Golf Plantation, Mint Hill

Eleven years ago five young men from the CCHS class of '84 began what has become an annual event for friends, family and alumni of CCHS. It was established to remember two young women, both alumni of CCHS: Megan Healy - class of '90, daughter of Jerry Healy and Kathy Healy; and Kara Kloiber - class of '93, daughter of Joe and Diane Kloiber.

Both girls were wonderful examples of CCHS, knowing always that Catholic education was a privilege and knowing, as well, that giving back to the community that supported them for 13 years of Catholic school would be their gift. They celebrated all that CCHS has to offer, a faith community like no other supported by fine academics and people who continue to make a difference -- not only at CCHS but throughout the Catholic community.

The proceeds from this tournament go directly to the CCHS Foundation and are used entirely for CCHS student scholarships. To date more than $100,000 has been awarded.

To register, please contact:

Robert Boyd 704-374-3547 rboyd@wbtc.com, or

Mike Mahoney 704-543-3143 homegolf@yahoo.com

The Healy and Kloiber families, along with the recipients of these scholarships, thank you in advance for your continued support of this annual event. It is truly something to see and be part of as members of our community. CCHS alumni, friends and family come together to support this worthwhile tradition.

If you are unable to join us for this memorable outing and would like to make a donation, checks should be mailed to: Charlotte Catholic Golf Outings, 9307 Hanlin Ct., Charlotte, NC 28277.

resident, and Abbot Placid Solari, chancellor, formulated the overall strategic plan for the college's growth, the first item on the list was the construction of a new adoration chapel — the first new building on campus in almost 20 years.

"The first line of our mission statement says 'Belmont Abbey College finds its center in Jesus Christ,'" said Thierfelder.

"Out of everything that we were going to build, I wanted this to be the first thing that we broke ground on because I thought that it communicated, more powerfully than I possibly could, what we actually value and what we think is at the core and route of Belmont Abbey College," he said.

"My hope is that by having the Blessed Sacrament here in adoration, we will attract vocations to the monastic community and good, solid, holy students to Belmont Abbey College," he said.

Work on the chapel began a little more than two years ago with a groundbreaking Aug. 22, 2006.

The completed St. Joseph Adoration Chapel was blessed by Bishop Peter J. Jugis Nov. 7.

"It is a very visible symbol that Belmont Abbey is a Catholic college," said Abbot Solari.

Nestled in the woods near the campus dormitories, the chapel is designed to accommodate approximately 40 people.

"It's right here for the students," he said referring to the chapel's location at the center of campus.

It contains a marble altar with a built-in tabernacle, originally from Mercy Hospital in Charlotte, and a wooden altar for the celebration of the Eucharist, originally from Sacred Heart Convent in Belmont — both donated by the Sisters of Mercy in Belmont.

"This was quite a vision," said Rep. Patrick McHenry, of North Carolina's 10th Congressional District, Belmont Abbey College alumnus.

"Abbot Placid and Dr. Thierfelder have been focused on growing Belmont Abbey and this is where they wanted to start," he said.

The chapel was completely funded by donations, according to Kenneth Davison, vice president of college relations, and more than 80 percent of the people who made donations for the chapel were first time donors to the college.

"Some of the most powerful messages are so simple," said McHenry. "This is a simple chapel, but it represents something amazing."

The original adoration chapel at Belmont Abbey College was a converted office located behind the monastery. It was inaugurated in 1995 by then-Bishop William G. Curlin.

Nestled in the woods near the campus dormitories, the St. Joseph Adoration Chapel at Belmont Abbey College can accommodate approximately 40 people. The Blessed Sacrament is exposed in the chapel about 16 hours a day.

the chapel was a cooperative effort of Belmont Abbey College, Queen of the Apostles Church in Belmont, St. Michael the Archangel Church in Gastonia and Holy Spirit Church in Denver.

It was the first perpetual adoration chapel in the diocese, according to Davison, but over the years the hours were cut back because there weren't enough participants.

In the new chapel, the Blessed Sacrament is exposed for approximately 16 hours a day, but the chapel is always open.

In his homily during the Mass for the blessing of the chapel, Bishop Jugis mentioned his wish that it again become a place of perpetual adoration.

"The love of Jesus remains at the very heart of the (Catholic) Church's life," said Bishop Jugis in a 2005 article in The Catholic News & Herald.

"Eucharistic worship gives life to all the ministries of the parish ... (and) to our Christian life in our homes and in our places of work," he said.

"I myself spend time each day in prayer before the Blessed Sacrament," said the bishop. "It is the real presence of Christ which makes the difference, adding a richness to the prayer as opposed to praying elsewhere."

Promoting life awareness

Kristen Giessler, a registered nurse and a Catholic, gives a health care presentation as part of a joint Silent No More and "40 Days for Life" pro-life campaign at the University of North Carolina-Charlotte Oct. 29. The presentation, given every hour on the hour throughout the day, was a new educational focus of the campaigns.

"40 Days for Life" is a nationwide ecumenical campaign aiming to end abortion through prayer, fasting, outreach and vigils. Silent No More, a coalition of more than 4,000 women and men who witness to the negative aftereffects of abortion, is a joint project of Priests for Life and Anglicans for Life.

'Roe' discusses pro-life advocacy since Roe v. Wade case

BY DEACON GERALD POTKAY
CORRESPONDENT

GREENSBORO — Norma McCorvey, the "Jane Roe" in the Roe v. Wade 1973 Supreme Court decision legalizing abortion, recently brought her pro-life message to Greensboro.

McCorvey, who became a pro-life supporter in 1995 after spending years as a proponent of legal abortion, was the keynote speaker during a fundraising banquet for Room at the Inn of the Carolinas in Greensboro Nov. 6.

Room at the Inn of the Carolinas offers crisis pregnancy assistance to homeless pregnant women during their pregnancies and after the birth of their babies.

Attending the banquet were Bishop Peter J. Jugis of the Diocese of Charlotte and Suffragan Bishop Peter Brewer of the Diocese of the Eastern United States of the Anglican Province of America.

The banquet featured talks by Room at the Inn of the Carolinas clients, who expressed gratitude for the assistance of the organization and its supporters.

As founder of the nondenominational Crossing Over Ministry (formerly named Roe No More Ministry), McCorvey, a Catholic convert, travels internationally speaking on behalf of the pro-life movement.

She is particularly interested in helping crisis pregnancy centers such as Room at the Inn of the Carolinas, which has facilities in both North and South Carolina.

McCorvey has said she still carries guilt for her involvement in what would become Roe v. Wade.

As a pregnant 22-year-old in 1969, McCorvey was referred by an adoption attorney to lawyers seeking a plaintiff for an abortion suit against the state of Texas. She said she signed the affidavit that brought the "holocaust" of abortion into the nation, although her baby was given up for adoption.

McCorvey said she was told that the legalization of abortion would end back-alley abortions and "probably" put a stop to rape and incest.

But the lawyers really wanted to legalize abortion across the land, she said in an interview.

In 1994, after more than two decades of guilt-induced drug binges and various jobs at abortion clinics, McCorvey began to change her mind about the abortion industry, especially when Operation Rescue moved next door to her workplace, an abortion clinic in Texas.

She was particularly enchanted with the friendliness of two little girls, Emily and Chelsea, the 7- and 4-year-old daughters of Operation Rescue workers.

"I was on the pro-abortion side so long, I didn't know how to react to the kindness and love that all these people and the children were showing me," said McCorvey.

She became disillusioned with her job admitting women for first-and second-trimester abortions. Each weekend, according to McCorvey, clinic staff had to perform enough abortions to meet a $40,000 quota.

McCorvey said she was tiring of the abortion movement, and had become "fed up with the lies and the mistreatment of the women" coming in for abortions.

When she started counseling women that they were under no obligation to go through with an abortion, thereby reducing the weekend numbers, she was fired.

In 1995, while attending a church service with Emily and Chelsea's family, McCorvey answered an "altar call," an invitation to come forward and publicly accept Christ as lord and savior.

A couple of years later, McCorvey felt called to the Catholic Church of her youth. (Her mother was Catholic and her father was a Jehovah's Witness.)

After receiving instruction in the Catholic faith at St. Albert's Priory at the University of Dallas, she became a Catholic in 1998.

"I think it's great being a Catholic, and I enjoy my work a great deal," said McCorvey.

In 2005, McCorvey and Sandra Cano, the "Mary Doe" of the companion 1973 Doe v. Bolton ruling, both unsuccessfully petitioned the Supreme Court to reconsider its rulings that legalized abortion.

McCorvey and Cano requested the court to set aside the decisions, or at least order a new trial on the merits for reversal. However, the court rejected the appeal.

"The stories given by Norma and the others are a good witness to God's mercy," said David Foppe, a parishioner at Our Lady of Grace Church in Greensboro who attended the banquet.

"They help us to keep on going to love others as God loves us. This is like going to a banquet in Heaven."

Reconciliation after election possible, but expected to take time

What Barkley experienced next illustrates some of the polarizing actions that separated people of faith during the election cycle.

"She asked me, 'Are you Catholic?'" Barkley said, recalling the Oct. 25 encounter at her suburban Cincinnati home. "I said 'Yes.' And she said 'Are you pro-choice?' and I said 'I'm not going to answer that. I have no reason to answer that.'"

That's when the unexpected visitor launched into a tirade aimed at the widow, the mother of three and a former vowed member of the Sisters of Charity of Cincinnati.

"You don't know what you are doing!" she shouted, stunning Barkley, who is involved in various ministries at her nearby parish, Immaculate Heart of Mary Church.

"I told her I felt I was very well-informed. I read the (U.S. bishops') Faithful Citizenship' document a year ago. I feel like I know the teaching of the church and I feel fine with my conscience," Barkley said.

Not persuaded, the woman's anger grew.

"She was furious with me," Barkley said.

Thrusting an envelope at Barkley, the woman turned and began walking away.

"I will be back and I will bring others with me," she said in a shrill voice. Halfway down the drive she turned and shouted again, "I will be back!"

The envelope, along with another that Barkley received in the mail four days later with the return address only indicating "Friends of Immaculate Heart of Mary," contained graphic images of aborted children, excerpts from Scripture and references to a Web site focusing on the "tough love" of Christ.

The irate visitor's threats never were carried out, but Barkley was shaken enough to call the Hamilton County Sheriff's Department. The dispatcher advised her to call 911 should the woman or her supporters return.

"What I'm feeling is why do I have to prove to these people that I'm a good person," Barkley later told Catholic News Service. "It bothers me that they perceive me as evil and it's very hurtful."

A tall order

Seemingly, the most heartfelt anger has revolved around the issues of pro-life and family concerns — abortion, euthanasia, stem-cell research, traditional marriage, all keystones of the Catholic faith. Some of the most strident voices have questioned the faithfulness of Catholic supporters of the Democratic ticket of Sens. Barack Obama and Joe Biden.

Likewise, the din of malicious rhetoric has hardly left supporters of Republicans Sen. John McCain and Gov. Sarah Palin untouched. Not only have staunch partisans attacked the candidates themselves in humiliating ways unheard of in 20th-century campaigns, but voters supporting the GOP duo have been degraded and mocked for their positions as well.

So what lies ahead? After the rancor of the campaign, can America overcome the contempt that at times has bordered on hate? Can people of faith be reconciled so that they can stand behind the White House's new occupant as he attempts to unify an increasingly polarized country?

"It's a tall order," said Marie Dennis, director of the Maryknoll Office of Global Concerns in Washington.

She said the basis for reconciliation can be found in the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops' 2007 document on political responsibility, "Forming Consciences for Faithful Citizenship."

"The bishops' political responsibility document was excellent," Dennis told CNS. "It really laid the groundwork for that kind of reconciliation because it really embraces the moral dilemma that we face that I think is at the root of the conflict."

"Part of the challenge is we all know we are faced with imperfect choices, and that makes everybody anxious that there is not going to be a definitive answer to the great moral challenges of our time in the short term," she said.

U.S. President-elect Barack Obama and Iraq War veteran Tammy Duckworth, a double amputee, walk together to place a wreath at a veterans memorial in Chicago Nov. 11. Duckworth is director of the Department of Veterans Affairs for Illinois.

The key, Dennis offered, is for Catholics to open an honest discussion with each other.

"You have to listen to each other respectfully ... we have to begin with the belief that we are all people of good will and that if we are caring enough to pay attention to these serious moral issues, that we're trying to do it from the deepest place in our hearts," Dennis said.

"That may be the prophetic role of the church right now, ... to insist that that is necessary, that we as a Catholic community model the kind of right relationships that we wish for the world," she added.

That will be difficult, in the eyes of Bishop Nicholas DiMarzio of Brooklyn, N.Y., who chaired the USCCB committee that wrote "Faithful Citizenship."

He told CNS that while there is a need for people to stop "looking for the worst in the other," Catholics still must challenge intrinsic evils such as abortion as long as they remain the law of the land.

"There's no compromise and no easy way around it," Bishop DiMarzio said. "There are ways on how we can limit an intrinsic evil and we should take those steps."

"But there's a culture of death you are supporting and it's not going to go away. We are going to have a hard time reconciling," he said.

Apologies and love

Even as the life issues are of foremost concern, Vincent Rougeau, associate professor of law at the University of Notre Dame in Indiana, said Catholics of differing perspectives must reach out to each other so that the wounds opened by those who question the validity of someone's faith because of their voting preferences are not left untended.

"When really hurtful words have been exchanged and people are diminished and demeaned in ways that are debasing and demoralizing, you've got to do some repair work," explained Rougeau, who has widely taught and written about Catholic social teaching and its intersection with public life.

"Part of that is extending a hand and saying, 'Let's have a conversation from the places that we share and recognizing that we don't live in a perfect world and that there are difficult decisions we have to make and we may not come to the same conclusions,'" Rougeau told CNS.

Father Frank Pavone, national director of Priests for Life, lamented that "we have lost the ability within the church and society in general to constructively challenge and criticize one another."

He called for reconciliation where there has been "rash judgment, harshness, lack of charity, real anger, sometimes rising to the level of hatred."

"What needs to be done is that people who have crossed the line of charity and justice simply need to apologize," he said.

"Catholic faith and Christian morality require that we make up for it somehow. You can't put the feathers back inside the pillow when you harm someone's reputation, but you can make amends," said Father Pavone.

Despite such calls, the question over whether Catholics can be reconciled with each other remains.

Notre Dame's Rougeau said the answer can be found in Catholic social teaching.

"You have to say you're available," he said, "and you're willing to talk and think about one of the core messages of Catholic social teaching — openness to the other, the people you least want to deal with to have the transformative experience of Christian love."

"If black South Africans (now) can talk with white South Africans, if Jews can talk to former Nazis, we can talk to each other," he said.

Obama phones pope to thank him for congratulatory message

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — U.S. President-elect Barack Obama telephoned Pope Benedict XVI to thank the pope for his message of congratulations on his election victory.

The pope was one of the many world leaders Obama has been contacting since his Nov. 4 win.

The Vatican spokesman, Jesuit Father Federico Lombardi, confirmed to Catholic News Service Nov. 12 that the president-elect telephoned the pope Nov. 11 "to thank the pope for his telegram, his congratulations" on winning the U.S. presidential election.

Further details about the call were not known, Father Lombardi said.

Pope Benedict sent his congratulations Nov. 5, referring to the "historic occasion" of the election, marking the first time a black man has been elected president of the United States.

Father Lombardi said Nov. 5 the pope prayed that "the blessing of God would sustain him (Obama) and the American people so that with all people of good will they could build a world of peace, solidarity and justice."

The press office for Obama's presidential transition team said all conversations with world leaders are private and no details would be released on this conversation or any conversation with world leaders.

Highlights of 2008 USCCB fall general assembly

BALTIMORE (CNS) — At the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops' Nov. 10-12 fall general assembly in Baltimore, the bishops:

— Heard their president, Chicago Cardinal Francis E. George, acknowledge the historic significance of the election of President-elect Barack Obama and pray that the incoming president will be able to succeed in his task for the good of all.

— Warned the new administration and new Congress that lifting existing federal abortion restrictions would permanently alienate tens of millions of Americans and could be seen as an attack on religious freedom.

— Said the church will continue in a time of economic crisis to reach out to those in need, stand with those who are hurt, and work for more just and compassionate policies.

— Approved another lengthy section of the English translation of the third edition of the Roman Missal, which must now be confirmed by the Vatican.

— Chose the Revised Grail Psalter produced by the monks of Conception Abbey in Missouri over the Revised New American Bible translation of the Book of Psalms for liturgical use in the United States.

— Overwhelmingly approved a liturgical service in English and Spanish for blessing children in the womb.

— Elected Bishop George V. Murry of Youngstown, Ohio, as USCCB secretary-elect and chose chairmen-elect for five USCCB committees.

— Approved a $144 million budget and a lengthy list of plans and programs for the USCCB in 2009.

— Set a host of goals for five task forces on issues ranging from strengthening marriage to addressing cultural diversity in the church as priority initiatives through 2011.

— Heard a report from the Catholic Campaign for Human Development that it cut off funding earlier this year to the Association of Community Organizations for Reform Now, known as ACORN, for reasons unrelated to the organization's current troubles over voter registration and partisan politics.

— Voted in favor of a revised process for submitting "varia" — new issues that an individual bishop or group of bishops would like to see considered by the full body.

— Explored how domestic and international charitable organizations have found encouragement and helpful guidance in Pope Benedict XVI's first encyclical, "Deus Caritas Est" ("God Is Love").

— Learned The Catholic University of America in Washington has had a record-breaking year for freshman enrollment and for national fundraising, but lost millions in investments in the 2008 economic meltdown.

opposing evil."

It warns against interpreting the outcome of the Nov. 4 elections as "a referendum on abortion" and says "aggressively pro-abortion policy legislation and executive orders will permanently alienate tens of millions of Americans."

The statement was crafted during the bishops' meeting in Baltimore and involved a total of nearly three hours of discussion during executive and public sessions Nov. 11.

Under USCCB policies, statements drafted outside the usual committee approval process may be issued by the conference president on behalf of the bishops.

The final product was written under the supervision of Cardinal Francis E. George of Chicago, USCCB president after the bishops weighed in with recommendations about its content, tone and writing style.

After an overnight writing session the statement was read by Cardinal George to the body of bishops, who greeted it with applause.

Among other meeting actions, the bishops approved a statement on the economy, a blessing for children in the womb and a second section of the Roman Missal translation.

They gave five task forces the authority to develop church priorities up to 2011 on issues ranging from strengthening marriage to addressing cultural diversity in the church.

They also approved a budget of $144 million, a 2.25 percent increase from 2008, and they elected a conference secretary-elect and chairmen-elect for five committees: pro-life activities; cultural diversity; communications; doctrine and national collections.

On the economy

In their statement on the economic crisis, approved Nov. 11, they reminded people that "we are our brothers' and sisters' keepers. We are all in this together."

Adopted in a voice vote, the brief statement released by Cardinal George on behalf of the bishops noted that "hard times can isolate us or they can bring us together."

"As pastors and bishops, we see the many human and moral consequences of this crisis," the statement said.

Though the impact of the crisis is greater in some regions of the country, families all across the nation are losing their homes, workers are losing their jobs and health care coverage, retirement savings are threatened and people are losing the sense of hope and security it continued.

But the church will continue to "reach out to those in need, stand with those who are hurt, and work for policies that bring greater compassion, accountability and justice to economic life," the statement said.

authorize task forces

The bishops concluded by offering prayers for anyone who is "hurting, anxious or discouraged in these difficult times."

Roman Missal

Despite some continued criticism that the latest English translation of the third edition of the Roman Missal is plagued by obscure wording and sentences that are too long, the U.S. bishops approved another lengthy section of the translation Nov. 11.

Needing affirmation by two-thirds of the 264 Latin-rite U.S. bishops, or 176 bishops, the heavily amended translation of the Proper of the Seasons — made up of the proper prayers for Sundays and feast days during the liturgical year — received 189 votes in favor and 30 against.

During the bishops' meeting in Orlando, Fla., in June, the document failed to get the required two-thirds majority.

Bishop Arthur J. Serratelli of Paterson, N.J., chairman of the bishops' Committee on Divine Worship, called the translation "a step forward in the continual renewal of the liturgy" and said no document was ever likely to receive the unanimous support of the bishops.

The translation now goes to the Vatican Congregation for Divine Worship and the Sacraments for "recognitio," or confirmation. The first section of the missal came before the bishops in 2006 and was confirmed by the Vatican earlier this year.

Blessings and psalms

To fill a gap in existing prayer books, the U.S. bishops overwhelmingly approved a liturgical service in English and Spanish for blessing children in the womb.

Archbishop Joseph E. Kurtz of Louisville, Ky., praised the new blessing as "a tangible way to witness pastorally and sacramentally to the life of the unborn child" and said it could also serve as an opportunity for parishes to bring together expectant couples for mutual support.

The document also must be sent to the Vatican Congregation for Divine Worship and the Sacraments for "recognitio," or confirmation. The English-language version was approved 223-1 and the Spanish-language version 224-0.

The U.S. bishops later chose the Revised Grail Psalter produced by the monks of Conception Abbey in Missouri for liturgical use in the United States.

The Nov. 12 vote was 203-5 in favor of accepting a recommendation of the USCCB Committee on Divine Worship to adopt the Grail Psalter for use in all liturgical settings. The decision also must be confirmed by the Vatican.

There was little debate before the vote and no amendments could be made to the translated psalms.

CCHD and ACORN

In a report to the bishops Nov. 11, Auxiliary Bishop Roger P. Morin of New Orleans explained that the Catholic Campaign for Human Development (CCHD) cut off funding earlier this year to the Association of Community Organizations for Reform Now, known as ACORN, for reasons unrelated to the organization's current troubles over voter registration and partisan politics.

Bishop Morin, chairman of the U.S. bishops' subcommittee on the CCHD, said the U.S. bishops' domestic anti-poverty program which supports community groups in June suspended $1.13 million in previously authorized grants to ACORN affiliates.

No new applications from ACORN for the coming year were approved, he added.

Bishop Morin explained that the CCHD action followed the revelation June 2 that Dale Rathke, the brother of ACORN founder Wade Rathke, had embezzled nearly $1 million from the organization and its affiliates in 1999 and 2000.

Dale Rathke stepped down from his position with the national organization in June when the matter became public; no charges were filed against him.

That revelation "raised questions about transparency and governance of ACORN," Bishop Morin told the bishops.

CCHD commissioned a forensic audit to determine whether any of the church's funds had been stolen or used inappropriately.

A final report is pending, but he said the work so far has concluded that "our funds were not involved with those embezzled at the national office."

Other items

In an action related to key priorities established earlier by the bishops, the prelates agreed to grant five task forces the authority to tackle issues ranging from strengthening marriage to addressing cultural diversity in the church through 2011 and approved a host of goals for each task force for the next year.

The task forces are on faith formation and sacramental practice; strengthening marriage; the life and dignity of the human person; cultural diversity in the church; and the promotion of vocations to the priesthood and consecrated life.

The task forces are expected to come back to the 2009 fall general assembly with detailed reports about meeting the American church's agenda on these issues, said Bishop Gerald F. Kicanas of Tucson, Ariz., conference vice president.

"It's a tremendous investment for the conference," Bishop Kicanas said. "These are more than goals and objectives. These are lifelong challenges."

Several U.S. bishops who attended the Oct. 5-26 world Synod of Bishops on the Bible in Rome discussed the moving experience they had and their rediscovery of the beauty of the word of God.

They also said Pope Benedict XVI was present during much of the synod and was attentive to what was being said.

Almost lost in the busy Nov. 11 afternoon session was the 2009 USCCB budget. The bishops approved a budget of $144 million, a 2.25 percent increase from 2008.

In one of the few votes on the meeting's first day, Nov. 10, the bishops agreed to a revised process for submitting "varia" — new issues that an individual bishop or group of bishops would like to see considered by the full body.

The new process was designed to allow for flexibility but conform to criteria established under the USCCB reorganization last year.

The bishops also decided by voice vote to review the USCCB regulations on statements and publications in light of the reorganization.

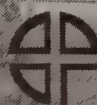

Revised regulations were expected to be submitted to the full body in June.

Woman says Holy Spirit inspired 'talking Bible' storybook

Battery-operated book to appeal to Christians of all denominations

BY PAULA DOYLE
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

LOS ANGELES — Three years ago, Pamela Fischer woke up one morning in Los Angeles with a new vocation. The 48-year-old wife and mother of two St. Monica High School students and a college freshman art major had an idea for a book project.

"I felt an inspiration from the Holy Spirit to get together a Bible storybook for little ones," said Fischer, a parishioner of St. Paul the Apostle Church.

Although she was a publishing neophyte, she wasn't daunted by the challenge of producing a battery-operated Bible for pre-readers and early readers. The recently released book, which was approved by the Los Angeles archdiocesan Office of Religious Education, is titled "This Bible Talks! A Child's First 'Press & Play' Bible Storybook."

"You don't question the Holy Spirit when you feel it strongly. In discernment, I felt very comfortable and at ease and at peace that this was something I should do," said Fischer, a longtime member of her parish women's faith-sharing group.

Her first step toward accomplishing her mission was to meet with officials at St. Paul the Apostle's parish school, then with second-grade chaplain, Paulist Father Brad Schoeberle, who picked 28 to 30 core Bible stories that particularly connected with young children.

Fischer pared the stories down to 20 and began writing short narratives.

"It was a lot of days of prayer. I would write and I would pray," said Fischer.

A volunteer for ecumenical causes promoting Christian unity among Catholics, Protestants and members of Orthodox churches, Fischer wanted the Bible storybook to appeal to Christians of all denominations.

To that end, she contacted Msgr. Lloyd Torgerson, pastor of St. Monica Church in Santa Monica, who reviewed the text from a Catholic perspective. A Methodist minister Fischer knew suggested a few subtle changes, then the vetted text received a stamp of approval from her publisher's Eastern Orthodox bishop.

"It's so important to me to have the little children come to know Christ. I just really wanted to make this Bible universal to all Christian churches. I didn't want any child left out," Fischer said.

as a central focus in her life. When she had her own children, now ages 20, 17 and 14, she made sure she read stories to them about Jesus when they were small.

"My vision is that this Bible in different languages will reach out to children around the world, especially those living in poverty," said Fischer, who added she didn't want a child's illiteracy to keep him or her from learning about Jesus.

With the generous financial backing of her husband, Joel, a carpenter/house builder and Catholic convert, Fischer was able to self-publish the book, with two triple-A batteries included.

Nonreaders who peruse "This Bible Talks!" can hear a narration of the text by pressing the picture icons on the book's raised plastic panel. Early readers can follow the text as they listen to the engaging voice of the male narrator.

The talking Bible includes 16 chapters with short, paragraph-length stories from both the Old and New Testaments, starting with "God's Gift of Creation" and ending with "Jesus Sends Us the Holy Spirit."

The colorful illustrations, many showing a smiling Jesus, were a team effort by artist-daughter Jenny, who drew the initial sketches, and Nicole Armitage, a former Disney artist. Fischer's husband, who was a college English major, helped with editing.

Christ is the one who will rescue the world

BY SHARON K. PERKINS
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

A popular story describes a man stranded on his rooftop, praying as the floodwaters rise. When a boat with a rescue crew arrives, he refuses their help, saying, "No, God will save me."

Later, a helicopter pilot meets with the same response. Eventually the man drowns, and upon reaching heaven he asks God, "Why didn't you save me?" whereupon God replies, "I sent you a boat and a helicopter!"

Obviously, this anecdote is about not recognizing God's saving power when it arrives, usually because it doesn't appear on one's own terms or in the way one imagines it will.

This paradox is borne out in the readings for the feast of Christ the King. The compassionate rescue of God's lost sheep, as promised in Ezekiel, goes hand in hand with Christ's stern judgment of them in the Gospel of Matthew — giving us a greater insight into both rescue and judgment.

For in the Scriptures, God's judgment isn't simply an act of retribution or punishment. When heeded, it can also correct, teach and heal in a way that rescues and restores.

In 1925, Pope Pius XI instituted this great feast of the church year as an antidote for the secularism of the age that attempted to exclude God from both private and public life, thus placing at risk the defenseless and the weak of society.

Unlike the power-seeking regime of this world, the kingship of Christ — largely unrecognizable to those who are expecting something else — is one of humility and service. Christ's saving judgment of the "sleek and the strong," or his "shepherding rightly" those who do not yet recognize him in the least of his brothers and sisters, can truly become their "rescue."

This judgment applies not merely to individuals, but to the nations of the world who are to be held accountable for the treatment of their weakest members.

Our contemporary world isn't all that different from 1925, the age of Ezekiel or the age of Matthew: Many human beings still find themselves "scattered" in their rejection of God and their focus on self.

But Christ — their judge and their rescuer — still reigns.

Questions:

In what way have I misunderstood or misread Christ's "rescue" in my life? If were to examine closely my treatment of the least of Christ's brothers and sisters how would I be judged?

Scripture to be Illustrated:

"I will rescue them from every place where they were scattered" (Ezekiel 34:12).

Musicologist pays tribute to nuns with rediscovery of religious music

BY JEAN M. SCHILDZ
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

ST. LOUIS — Geraldine Rohling's network has led her to discoveries of forgotten works of religious music and a way to repay the School Sisters of Notre Dame for the education she cherishes and the hospitality they've shown her during her years of search.

Rohling is an internationally recognized musicologist, conductor and composer and is the archivist and curator of the Basilica of the National Shrine of the Immaculate Conception in Washington.

She came home to her native St. Louis in mid-October to prepare for Oct. 24 benefit concert to honor the sisters' 175th anniversary and 150 years of ministry in the St. Louis Archdiocese.

The centerpiece for the concert was music she recovered — "Jubel Messe" (Jubilation Mass) by composer Max Keller — from archives in the German state of Bavaria and in Austria. She also chose a piece by Johann Caspar Aiblinger.

Both Keller's and Aiblinger's compositions are from the region and the period of the founding of the School Sisters of Notre Dame.

In addition, the concert program opened with her own composition, "Lucernarium: The Lighting of the Evening Lamps," and include pieces by Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart and Johann Michael Haydn, the younger brother of Franz Joseph Haydn.

In an interview with the St. Louis Review, the archdiocesan newspaper, Rohling spoke about how she came to find Keller's Mass and the connection he and Aiblinger and their music have to the sisters.

She said Keller was a contemporary of Blessed Theresa of Jesus Gerhardinger, the foundress of the congregation. His Mass — and his last known composition — was first performed Oct. 6, 1851, in Altotting in Bavaria.

Four years before, Blessed Theresa had sent five candidates on pilgrimage to the Shrine of Our Lady in Altotting. There they prayed for members of the congregation who, in 1847, were to leave to minister in America.

After its premiere, Keller's composition was placed in the music archives of the Kapellstiftung in Altotting. The work didn't see the light of day for more than a century until Rohling found it in 2005.

She then prepared a performance edition of it. Her revival of the Mass premiered in Altotting in 2007. It took place at a national celebration of Mary, the patroness of Bavaria, and in honor of the 80th birthday of Pope Benedict XVI.

Aiblinger was director of the Royal Court Orchestra in Munich, Germany, in the early 1800s. He was a friend of Blessed Theresa and, according to the congregation's records, was one of her favorite composers.

He lived at the motherhouse in Munich and composed music for the sisters.

"There are some days when I just sit and pinch myself," said Rohling of her discovery and of the ability to do something for the sisters.

Rohling graduated from Notre Dame High School in St. Louis in 1970 and is an alumna of the former Notre Dame College. She also taught at the high school in 1980s.

She had planned to become a School Sister of Notre Dame as a young adult. Although she was accepted into the community, she said she wasn't ready to join them just then.

"But I didn't say, 'No, never.' I have to tell you, they are my sisters, they are my community. I belong to them and they belong to me, whether on paper or not," she said.

She eventually earned a doctorate in musicology and liturgy from The Catholic University of America in Washington and now specializes in sacred music and ritual.

In Austria, where she spent years researching materials, she is considered an authority on the musical and liturgical life of 17th- and 18th-century Vienna. Austrian Cardinal Christoph Schonborn of Vienna has called her "the scholar" of the Viennese Bruderschaften, or brotherhoods.

When Rohling studied in Europe she lived with the School Sisters of Notre Dame at their convent in Vienna.

"It was kind of like another home to me," she said.

Through her travels for research, she also came to know the sisters in several other European locales. Now, she said, her work has brought her back full circle to these sisters.

The benefit concert — and the American premiere of "Jubel Messe" — was planned as a celebration of who the School Sisters of Notre Dame are, said Rohling.

She said she told some of the sisters the concert conducted by her was "truly going to be a living, breathing page of your history. This is your history taking on flesh once again."

"To remember is to give life," according to an old rabbi's expression, Rohling said. "And this is exactly what we are doing. We are celebrating (foundress Mother Theresa's) vision."

"We are celebrating the generations of women who have embodied that vision and have gone forward with it," she said.

Bible's 'Buried Secrets' come to PBS this month

NEW YORK (CNS) — The origins of the Hebrew Scriptures — regarded as the inspired word of God by the roughly 3 billion worldwide adherents of Judaism, Christianity and Islam — are shrouded in obscurity.

Most scholars now reject the long-held belief that Moses was the author of the Torah (first five books of the Bible). Instead, they see them as products of a long oral tradition, the stories being passed down in different versions before eventually being woven into the text we know.

"The Bible's Buried Secrets," an intriguing, sometimes provocative look at how contemporary archaeology sheds light on this process, airs on PBS' "Nova" series Tuesday, Nov. 18, 8-10 p.m. EST.

Writer-director Gary Glassman's documentary also examines the historical underpinnings of such pivotal scriptural events as the Exodus, the Jewish conquest of Canaan and the building of Solomon's Temple. Through interviews with archaeologists and scholars, the film establishes a narrative of early Jewish history distinct from, but related to, the biblical account, yet one that relies entirely on secular explanations.

The most controversial claim advanced here is that Yahweh, the living God of Israel, was originally a pagan deity the Jews imported from neighboring Midian — the site of Moses' encounter with God in the burning bush. Midian's residents worshipped a god with a similar-sounding name.

Yahweh, the program maintains, was also once understood to have a goddess wife, whose graven image the Israelites worshipped.

This theory fails to account, however, for the revolutionary religious innovation that made the Jewish people unique in the classical world: their monotheism, or devotion to only one God. If Yahweh was at first just another local idol, how was he later so radically transformed?

Other insights, like the crucial influence of the Israelites' sixth century B.C. Babylonian exile — which saw their worship of Yahweh become exclusive — are more solidly grounded. This national trauma, researchers suggest, may also have spurred the compilation of the various biblical sources.

In addition to footage of archaeological sites around the Holy Land and throughout the Middle East, the program features ancient, medieval and more recent artwork illustrating biblical incidents and impressive animated reconstructions of classical structures.

The TV Parental Guideline for this program is TV-PG — parental guidance suggested.

'A Christmas Tale' not worth telling

NEW YORK (CNS) — "A Christmas Tale" ("Un Conte de Noel") is the portrait of a dysfunctional French family and their angst-ridden relationships.

Though this downbeat drama, as written and directed by Arnaud Desplechin, inches toward reconciliation, uniformly fine acting from the ensemble cast only makes the discord along the way that much more uncomfortable to watch.

An ambivalent portrayal of faith and an indulgence of adultery add further complications.

Holiday joy is conspicuously lacking as three grown siblings — Elizabeth, a successful playwright; Henri, a tipting ne'er-do-well; and Ivan, a would-be peacemaker caught in the emotional crossfire — gather at their parents' home for a rare reunion.

Their mother, Junon, has just been diagnosed with the same disease that killed their older brother, Joseph, in childhood. Junon's survival may depend on a bone-marrow transplant, and only Elizabeth's troubled teenage son, Paul, and Henri are compatible. Henri, we've learned, was conceived in the hope that he would be a suitable donor for Joseph.

The failure of that plan lies at the root of his seemingly loveless relationship with his mother. After a very long evening of confrontations, insults and the occasional fistfight — jovially presided over by the clan's timid patriarch, Abel — Henri, Junon and Paul go off to midnight Mass and, though only Paul is shown praying, all three emerge refreshed.

Back home, however, Ivan's two sons stare at a manger scene and ask when Jesus is coming, only to be told "Jesus never existed."

Motivated by a startling family secret, Ivan's wife, Sylvia, has an adulterous encounter that the film presents sympathetically, though the script also clearly signals that there will be no repetition of this event.

In French with subtitles. The film contains graphic adulterous sexual activity, partial upper female and brief rear nudity, cohabitation, occasional rough and crude language, and sexual references. The USCCB Office for Film & Broadcasting classification is L — limited adult audience, films whose problematic content many adults would find troubling. Not rated by the Motion Picture Association of America.

Perspectives

A collection of columns, editorials and viewpoints

My Dear Friends in Christ,

There are nearly 37 million people in the United States struggling below the poverty line, and 13 million of those are children. Poverty is caused not simply by the lack of financial resources but also by the lack of quality education, affordable housing, health care, child care, fair wages and vocational training.

The Catholic Campaign for Human Development (CCHD) has worked for the last 38 years to create permanent, community-based solutions to the problem of poverty by funding programs that promote self-sufficiency by helping the poor to help themselves.

You may have heard about the suspension of CCHD funds to an organization called the Association of Community Organizations for Reform Now, known as ACORN, or read the article about the situation in the Nov. 7 edition of The Catholic News & Herald. This suspension is the CCHD's immediate response to financial misdoings at ACORN that came to light in June 2008.

CCHD funding to ACORN was suspended immediately and unilaterally across the country; its swift and immediate response to the ACORN situation is an indication of CCHD's sound fiscal accountability. This funding freeze will remain in effect until the situation is resolved and it can be confirmed that no CCHD funds were misdirected or misused.

Since the majority of CCHD's funding comes through its annual parish collection, which this year takes place on the weekend of Nov. 22-23, 2008, it would be unfortunate if contributions were affected by the ACORN situation. Hundreds of groups are working effectively in communities across the country with the aid of CCHD funds.

CCHD's history of careful vetting and monitoring of grantee organizations stands as a model of good stewardship. Moreover, the campaign receives wide support across the country from people who have witnessed its effectiveness in helping people to rise above poverty using resources found within their own communities, many funded by CCHD.

With today's economic uncertainties, your contribution to this year's collection for the Catholic Campaign for Human Development is more important than ever before. Thank you for your prayers and support. May Almighty God bless you for your generosity.

Respectfully,

Msgr. Mauricio W. West

What reduces abortions?

Law cannot solve all problems, but can tell us which solutions are unacceptable

Sometimes election years produce more policy myths than good ideas. This year one myth is about abortion.

It goes like this: The Supreme Court's Roe v. Wade decision is here to stay, and that's fine because laws against abortion don't reduce abortions much anyway. Rather, "support for women and families" will greatly reduce abortions, without changing the law or continuing a "divisive" abortion debate.

Various false claims are used to bolster this myth. It is said that over three-quarters of women having abortions cite expense as the most important factor in their decision.

Actually the figure is less than one-fourth: 23 percent.

It is said that abortion rates declined dramatically (30 percent) during the Clinton years, but the decline stopped under the ostensibly pro-life Bush administration.

Actually the abortion rate has dropped 30 percent from 1981 to 2005; the decline started 12 years before Clinton took office, and has continued fairly steadily to the present day.

The steepest decline is among minors. Is it plausible that economic factors reduced abortions for teens but not their older sisters, or their mothers who support them?

The reality is this: In 1980 the Supreme Court upheld the Hyde amendment, a provision barring use of federal funds to pay for abortions for low-income women, first passed by the U.S. Congress in 1976, and and federally-funded abortions went from 300,000 a year to nearly zero.

With its decisions in Webster v. Reproductive Health Services (1989) and Planned Parenthood v. Casey (1992), the Supreme Court began to uphold other abortion laws previously invalidated under Roe v. Wade. States passed hundreds of modest but effective laws — such as, bans on use of public funds and facilities, informed consent laws, parental involvement when minors seek abortions, etc.

The rigorous research of Dr. Michael New, a University of Alabama political science professor and senior Family Research Council fellow, has shown that these laws significantly reduce abortions.

In the 1990s, debate on partial-birth abortion — kept in the public eye, ironically, by President Clinton repeated vetoes of a ban on this grisly late-term procedure — alerted many Americans to the violence of abortion and shifted public attitudes in a pro-life direction, just as growing concern over AIDS and other sexually transmitted diseases was giving new force to the abstinence message for teens.

Now the Supreme Court has upheld a partial-birth abortion ban, and signaled that other laws to save unborn children and their mothers from the horrors of abortion may be valid. If Roe v. Wade is reversed outright, that will allow more laws that can further reduce abortions.

By contrast, a pending federal Freedom of Choice Act (FOCA) would knock down current laws reducing abortions and require public programs for pregnant women to fund abortion. No one supporting that bill can claim favor reducing abortions.

Many women are pressured toward abortion and they need our help. The pressures are partly, but not only partly, economic in nature. Women are influenced by husbands, boyfriend, parents and friends, and by a culture and legal system that tell them the children they carry have no rights and are of no consequences.

Law cannot solve all problems but it can tell us which solutions are unacceptable — and today, Roe v. Wade still teaches that killing the unborn child is an acceptable solution, even a "right."

Without ever forgetting the need to support pregnant women and their families, that tragic and unjust error must be corrected if we are to build a society that respects all human life.

Imitating St. Francis of Assisi

Each one of us has the ability to help someone in need

After months of electioneering and small news about our financial crisis, I have the audacity to invite you to become one of God's minstrels of joy!

Minstrels are often seen as fools, so don't blame you if you decide to shrug me off.

St. Francis of Assisi once wrote: "For what else are the servants of God but his minstrels, whose work is to lift people's hearts and move them to spiritual gladness."

I pray that you will consider lifting your imagination a little bit in order to see the amazing heights of spiritual joy waiting you.

Everyone who aspires to be one of God's minstrels is already blessed by divine providence. The simple wisdom of St. Francis is that we are all called to be instruments of God's joy in this world.

Think about this for a moment. It is an idea worthy of deep reflection.

Our mission as Christians is to carry God's love and joy with courage into our world. St. Francis had a special location to bring the spirit of gladness to those most in need.

He had a special fondness for the poor and wanted to do something to help them.

Most people tend to look away from the poor. As a result, many unfortunate souls remain lost in isolation, without any sign of love coming their way, which is why the words of St. Francis are so compelling.

Following his master Jesus Christ,

St. Francis wanted to do something extremely challenging. He wanted to bring the love and joy of God to those who need it most.

In his own words, he wanted to "lift people's hearts and move them to spiritual gladness."

Isn't that too difficult to accomplish? People are not open to joy when their lives are filled with misery.

How difficult can it be to be more gracious with the people we interact with each day? How difficult can it be to reach beyond our inner circle to just one other person who is sick or depressed?

Each one of us has the ability to help someone in need. According to St. Francis, our job is to cheerfully do the will of God. Even the tiniest gesture such as a smile can be a way of communicating spiritual gladness.

Spirituality for Today

FATHER JOHN CATOIR

If you want to spread God's joy, you must begin by notifying your face; in other words, the ministry of joy always begins with a smile.

Become one of God's minstrels. Embrace this challenge as a personal ministry between you and the Lord.

The wonderful thing about this grace is that the very act of spreading joy brings an increase of spiritual gladness to your own soul. Visiting the sick, feeding the hungry, comforting the distressed — these are all aspects of the ministry of joy.

When the corporal works of mercy are done joyfully, the merit is doubled.

God loves a cheerful giver. Spiritual minstrels say they are never so happy as when they get out of themselves and begin serving others.

Too great a preoccupation with self leads to sadness. Think of others.

If you are looking for a new mission in life, why not consider following St. Francis of Assisi?

Dedicate yourself to elevating people's hearts to gladness.

Spreading God's love and joy is a sure formula for increasing your own spiritual joy.

Pope urges Christians to pray for changes in world of violence, fear

The Pope Speaks

POPE BENEDICT XVI

VATICANCITY(CNS)—Christians must pray that Jesus comes into the lives of those who are suffering from selfishness and violence, including those in Congo and Sudan, said Pope Benedict XVI.

At his Nov. 12 weekly general audience, the pope focused on St. Paul's teaching about Jesus' second coming and how Christians are to live while waiting for the end of time.

In St. Paul's First Letter to the Corinthians, the apostle used the words "Marana, tha!" or "Come, Lord Jesus" to indicate how this ancient Christian prayer shows the joyful expectation of Jesus' return and the fulfillment of God's plan of salvation, said the pope.

The pope said it was probably very difficult for people today "to sincerely pray that this world perish, that the new Jerusalem come, that the Last Judgment arrive."

"Certainly we don't want the end of the world to come now, but on the other hand we do want this unjust world to come to an end and we do want the world to be fundamentally changed," he said.

Here is the text of the pope's audience remarks in English.

Dear Brothers and Sisters,

In our continuing catechesis on St. Paul, we now turn from his proclamation of Christ's death and resurrection to his teaching on the Lord's second coming.

For Paul, the Lord's return at the end of time will be accompanied by the resurrection of the dead and the consummation of his Kingdom, when all those who believed in him and trusted in his promises "will be with him for ever" in glory (cf. 1 Thess 4:17).

Christ's victorious reign has in fact already begun. Yet we, who have received the Spirit as the first fruits of our redemption, patiently await the fulfillment of that plan in our lives.

Our life in this world, marked by trials and tribulations, must be inspired by the hope of heaven and the expectation of our resurrection to glory.

Paul's rich eschatology, linking the "already" of Christ's resurrection to the "not yet" of our life in this world, is reflected in his statement that "in hope we were saved" (Rom 8:24).

This same joyful expectation of the Lord's return and the fulfillment of the Father's saving plan is seen in the ancient Christian prayer with which he concludes his first Letter to the Corinthians: Maranà, tha! Come, Lord Jesus!

Signs of the times in need of our prophetic gifts

Christians must respond, bring aid to the suffering

It was the most moving news report I have seen recently!

The "NewsHour with Jim Lehrer" featured workers emptying a home in foreclosure. The family who lost their home left all their belongings and just disappeared.

Furniture, computers and a number of personal items such as family pictures were left behind. One of the workers picked up a doll and showed it to the television crew.

"I don't enjoy this work," he said. This doll was the favorite toy of some child. It went to bed with her and was her companion throughout the day."

Another worker commented, "When people leave behind memorabilia, it is a sign of depression."

As other workers expressed similar sentiments, I wondered where these people were ending up. Were they being housed by friends or relatives, or were they just wandering around the country aimlessly?

This is one of many serious signs of the times that show we are in a depression. Perhaps it isn't a financial depression, but for many it is a nightmare that is causing psychological depression.

In moments like this, what is our Christian responsibility?

In baptism, we received the gift of prophecy. Most of us don't reflect on this, and if we do we usually feel that religious people, like the prophets of the Old Testament, are mainly responsible for practicing it.

And what is the "it" they practice? The prophets were God's mouthpieces. They did not foretell the future, but rather they discerned the signs of the times and God's will for them.

They were like sociologists who study societal trends to learn if they are going in the right direction.

Not only this, when the prophets saw the Israelites going in the wrong direction, they vigorously spoke out against it and admonished those in authority, urging them to change the situation.

The Human Side

FATHER EUGENE HEMRICK

As baptized Christians, it is our duty to read the signs of the times. St. Thomas Aquinas tells us that this is similar to practicing prudence, which he defines as "looking from afar."

At the moment, many people are suffering financial and psychological depression. As Christians, it is our baptismal responsibility to discern this and to come to their aid.

Sometimes this requires taking on political ramifications, marches and picketing. At other times, it requires opening our homes and dinner tables to the less fortunate.

When something is distasteful, it is a natural tendency to put it out of our minds. The signs of the times are prompting us to practice our gift of prophecy like never before and to make them foremost on our minds.

Scuffle in the Sepulcher

Franciscan: Brawl at Holy Sepulcher shows confusion over agreements

BY JUDITH SUDILOVSKY
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

JERUSALEM — The brawl that erupted Nov. 9 between Armenian Orthodox and Greek Orthodox clergymen at the Church of the Holy Sepulcher never should have happened and is the result of people not knowing what is in the Status Quo agreements, said a Franciscan official.

The 19th-century agreements include many oral traditions or customary law, but often each Christian community has its own codes, and clashes and contradictions occur, said U.S. Franciscan Father Athanasius Macora, who monitors the Church of the Holy Sepulcher for the Franciscan Custody of the Holy Land.

"People don't know the Status Quo. Because there is no shared code ... there are problems," he said, noting that the Status Quo committee meets weekly to discuss areas of disagreement.

"I hope we can all reconcile and get back to work," he said.

The Status Quo agreements regulate the jurisdiction of and access to key Christian sites in Jerusalem for Catholic, Orthodox and other Christian communities. Among those sites is the Church of the Holy Sepulcher, where tradition holds that Jesus was buried.

"There are huge areas of cooperation and good will, but what happened is very damaging for all of us," said Father Macora.

The Franciscans "were not at all involved, but (the incident) is damaging for everybody," he emphasized.

The altercation broke out next to the traditional site of Jesus' tomb during an annual Armenian Orthodox procession commemorating the fourth-century discovery of the cross believed to have been used to crucify Jesus.

The feud was sparked by the Greek Orthodox demand to post a monk inside the ancient structure built over the site of Jesus' tomb. When the Armenian Orthodox refused to admit the Greek Orthodox monk, more Greek monks blocked their path, and the melee ensued.

Israeli police rushed in to separate the fighting monks, arresting one Armenian and one Greek.

No pilgrims present at the procession were injured, said Father Macora, and sporadic altercations should not affect visits to the church.

Although there have been such confrontations in the past — on Palm Sunday Armenian and Greek priests and pilgrims also exchanged blows — Father Macora, who is originally from Texas, said such altercations are "anomalies."

Disagreements about the Status Quo also have prevented the Israeli Ministry of Tourism from building an emergency exit and have prevented repairs from being carried out on the rooftop Ethiopian Orthodox monastery.

Father Macora said that as the negotiator for the Franciscans he tries to avoid such confrontations by careful study of the actual Status Quo agreements before making any claims.

The last serious confrontations involving the Franciscans and the Greek Orthodox occurred four years ago, he said, adding that in general the Franciscans are known to have good relations with both the Armenians and the Greeks.

Gene Detmer of Arcadia, Calif., poses with his grandson Philadelphia Phillies relief pitcher Brad Lidge in late August. Lidge, who struck out Eric Hinske of the Tampa Bay (Fla.) Rays to clinch the 2008 World Series Oct. 29, was "a very gutsy guy" in the playoffs, said his grandfather.

Grandfather an inspiration for Phillies star on and off the field

ARCADIA, Calif. (CNS) — Philadelphia Phillies relief pitcher Brad Lidge, who struck out Eric Hinske of the Tampa Bay (Fla.) Rays to clinch the 2008 World Series Oct. 29, was "a very gutsy guy" in the playoffs, said his grandfather, Gene Detmer of Arcadia, Calif.

The 85-year-old retiree was thinking of Lidge's two crucial saves in the Phillies' 4-1 series win.

"To get behind a hitter doesn't throw him off stride. He's very disciplined. And from that point of view, he's thinking this is not the time to panic — this is the time to bear down," Detmer said.

Detmer recalled visiting his grandson in Denver, where the young man grew up in St. Thomas More Church and served as an altar boy.

During one of those trips, the then-4-year-old ran up to him and exclaimed, "I'm gonna play baseball." He and Brad promptly proceeded to the backyard, where Grandpa rolled a ball to his beaming grandson.

Lidge became a pitcher and later earned an athletic scholarship to the University of Notre Dame in Indiana. After his junior-year season, he was a first-round draft pick by the Houston Astros in 1998.

Lidge played in the minor leagues and made his major league debut in 2002 against the Atlanta Braves.

By the summer 2004, the Astros had moved him from setup man to closer, and he set a National League relievers' record with 157 strikeouts.

In 2006, he seemed to lose some of his confidence and the following year he lost his closer's role. Before the 2008 season Lidge was traded to the Phillies.

After a late spring start because of a knee injury and subsequent surgery, something almost magical happened. His four-seam fastball was back up to 96 mph and his hard slider was breaking sharper than ever. Lidge was named 2008 Major League Baseball Comeback Player of the Year.

Even his baseball aficionado grandfather was truly awed.

"I knew he was delighted to be traded, because the good Lord was watching over him," Detmer said.

For his part, Lidge credits his grandfather for much of his success on the ball field.

"One of the best memories I have growing up is being outside in his front yard in Pasadena and playing catch with him," he said.

He said he was inspired by his grandfather's baseball knowledge and treasure trove of memorabilia, but he has had an impact on the player's life overall.

"He's been a big role model for me in terms of my beliefs and shaping my values and morals," Lidge said. "He's been a big influence on me. Just to hear his wisdom and how he just goes about describing things day to day, he's classic."

He described his grandfather as "generous and accommodating."

"It's very inspiring for me to have such a great example. I hope when I'm his age I can give back the way he does, too," he said.

Detmer is somewhat amazed — and more than a little proud — that his grandson, the jock, is studying online for a degree in religious studies from Jesuit-run Regis University in Denver, and has plans to earn a doctorate in religious history so he can teach at the university level when his playing days are done.

FBI investigating white powder mailed to Knights' headquarters

NEW HAVEN, Conn. (CNS) — A mailroom and printing plant at the Knights of Columbus headquarters in New Haven remained closed Nov. 14 while the local FBI office investigated a white powder contained in an envelope mailed from California.

David Rhieu, chief division counsel at the FBI office in New Haven, said Nov. 14 that the testing of the powder will be completed within 48 hours and "the results will be released to the victim, the Knights of Columbus."

Rhieu said that while the investigation was ongoing he could not comment on whether the letter containing the powder could be linked to similar envelopes received at the national headquarters of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints in Salt Lake City and a Mormon temple in Los Angeles.

Patrick Korten, Knights of Columbus vice president for communications, told Catholic News Service Nov. 14 that the letter was received in the Knights mailroom on the morning of Nov. 13 and "produced a white powder when opened."

Local police and fire officials were notified and eventually the FBI was brought in, he said.

"Three individuals were decontaminated" following the incident and the mailroom and printing plant were to remain closed until Monday Korten said.

The Knights of Columbus and the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints were major financial supporters of California's Proposition 8, which amends the state constitution to define marriage as the union of one man and one woman. The amendment was approved, 52 percent to 48 percent, Nov. 4.

The Knights of Columbus is a Catholic fraternal organization.

Pope: Church must strengthen efforts to educate Catholics in politics

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — The Catholic Church must strengthen its efforts to educate and assist lay Catholics involved in politics so that the positions they hold and the policies they promote reflect the values of the faith they profess, Pope Benedict XVI said.

Meeting members of the Pontifical Council for the Laity Nov. 15, the pope emphasized the need to educate lay Catholics to play their proper role in building a world of justice, charity and protection of human rights.

"In a special way, I reaffirm the necessity and urgency of the evangelical formation and pastoral accompaniment of a new generation of Catholics involved in politics, that they would be coherent with their professed faith," morally upright, professional and passionate about serving the common good, he said.

Laypeople are called to fulfill their mission as followers and witnesses to Christ in government, social life, workplaces, schools and families, the pope said.

"Every environment, circumstance and activity in which we hope will shine the unity between faith and life is entrusted to the responsibility of the lay faithful, moved by a desire to communicate the gift of encountering Christ and the certainty of the dignity of the human person," the pope said.

Pope Benedict also praised the council for the laity's commitment to promoting the dignity and participation of women in the church and in the world.

"Man and woman, equal in dignity, are called to enrich each other in communion and collaboration, not only in marriage and family life, but also in society," he said.

"One can never say enough about how much the church recognizes, appreciates and values the participation of women in its mission of spreading the Gospel," the pope said.

Vatican newspaper says economic experts are confusing consumers

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — In the midst of a financial situation of great uncertainty, consumers have a right to be confused, said an article in the Vatican newspaper.

Too many so-called experts are telling consumers "the infallible remedy for overcoming the risk of poverty caused by the economic crisis under way" is to "spend, consume and go into debt to keep the economy going," said the article in L'Osservatore Romano.

But, the Nov. 17 article said, basically what those people are saying is that "to overcome the crisis it is necessary to continue the same behavior that provoked it, that is consumption and indebtedness."

The article was written by Ettore Gotti Tedeschi, an Italian banker and a professor of financial ethics at the Catholic University of the Sacred Heart in Milan.

He said people are right to be confused and even frightened when the same experts encouraging them to keep spending say that "a recession is under way and the worst is yet to come."

"Is it better, then, to consume to keep up demand or to save knowing that difficult times are ahead?" he asked.

The banker called on governments to be clearer about the conditions and demands they will place on financial institutions and industries asking for a bailout, "because otherwise the ones who will pay, as usual, are those who have savings accounts," mainly working individuals and families.

The front-page article appeared over a news story about the Nov. 15 meeting in Washington of the Group of 20 — the world's leading industrial countries, the European Union and several so-called emerging economies.

The article said that, while the presidents and prime ministers participating in the G-20 meeting expressed satisfaction with promises made to overcome the financial crisis, "in the final communique there is no reference to the poorest countries, those truly in the eye of the storm in this crisis" because of increased prices on food and the raw materials their struggling industries need.

The Vatican newspaper article said finding a solution will take time and "all eyes are turned to London" where the G-20 will meet again April 30, but this time with Barack Obama as president of the United States.

Carolina Panthers' fans wait in line to get their hot dogs at St. Peter Church's Garden of Eat'n in Charlotte Nov. 16. The "dollar dogs" have become quite a draw for Panthers' fans on home-game days, and all the proceeds go to local charitable organizations.

Parish helps local charities through game day hot dog sales hot dogs a Sunday, according to Tom Crozier, one of the organizers who started the ministry during the Panthers' first season in Charlotte in 1996.

With the location of the church lending it to high pedestrian traffic on game days, "we had to do something," he said.

"I like that all the benefits go to agencies that are here in town," said Lou Bonaiuto, an 11-year volunteer.

"A lot of people come here because of that. They like the idea that they are enjoying a hot dog and their money is going to a good cause," he said.

But most come because you can't beat the price, said Rose Zukiewicz, who has been volunteering since 2000.

Garden of Eat'n offers a simple menu: hot dogs, chips, cookies and drinks, all for a suggested donation of $1 each. Chili and other condiments are available to dress up the dogs.

"It's a really work-intensive ministry," said Zukiewicz.

Preparation begins at 8 a.m. on Sunday mornings with the biggest rush between 11 a.m. and 1 p.m.

The dogs are cooked on a grill right out in front of the church, placed in buns, wrapped in foil and kept in warmers in the church basement. Many take the food to go, but there are tables available for those who want to sit down and eat.

"People rave about it," said Crozier.

Organizations that have benefited from the proceeds include Catholic Social Services, Thomasboro Elementary School, Urban Ministry Center, McCreesh Place and the Emergency Winter Shelter.

Contributions were sent also to a Catholic parish in New York City following the Sept. 11, 2001 terrorist attacks and to relief efforts in New Orleans following the devastation by Hurricane Katrina in 2005.

The sessions will be held Saturday, Dec. 6, and Saturday, Jan. 10, 2009, at the Catholic Conference Center in Hickory. Potential candidates must first attend one of the two sessions to be considered for the permanent diaconate.

As ordained ministers in the Catholic Church, permanent deacons may perform baptisms, witness marriages and assist in various liturgies. The sessions will describe the responsibilities of the permanent deacon, the aspirancy and formation programs, the application requirements and anticipated class dates.

Wives of men who are considering the permanent diaconate must attend the session with their husbands.

The sessions will be presented in English, with Spanish language assistance for Spanish speakers. Child care will not be available.

Permanent diaconate

Basic requirements must be met to become part of the Diocese of Charlotte's permanent diaconate program.

Candidates 1) must have completed or be currently enrolled in the diocese's lay ministry program or SEPI, 2) must not be older than 65 in 2015, nor younger than 35 in 2011, 3) must have been a Catholic for at least five years, and 4) must be a legal, permanent resident of the United States.

The formation program is four years. Classes are held at the Catholic Conference Center Friday evening and all day Saturday twice a month beginning in September and ending in late May or early June. There are summer assignments to be completed in the candidates' churches.

"Pennies from Heaven" was a challenge from Msgr. McSweeney to his parishioners to save a penny per day, per family member from June to September.

The pennies were collected at the weekend Masses Sept. 20-21 and totaled $23,000.

During the Nov. 19 presentation, Msgr. McSweeney issued a challenge to other faith-based communities "to truly respond to the needs of different agencies that so generously and graciously serve the poor in our area."

"We have vehicles in place with different organizations that bring together the power that is here today," he said.

One of the organizations benefiting from the distribution was Catholic Social Services.

reflects a faith community with an incredibly generous and responsive spirit that has been extended not only to CSS but to a broad spectrum of agencies also dealing with a near crisis in service delivery to the growing needy and homeless in our community," said Geri King, director of the CSS Charlotte Regional Office.

Another recipient organization was Catherine's House in Belmont, a ministry sponsored by the Sisters of Mercy that provides transitional housing to women and women with children who are homeless.

"We have been so awed by their generosity," said Karen Andrews, president and CEO of Catherine's House.

"St. Matthew Church has been a wonderful source of support, both emotionally and financially, to this ministry and we are very grateful to Monsignor and all the parishioners there," she said.

The long-term goal is to go from homelessness to self-sufficiency, according to Msgr. McSweeney.

"I challenge all to truly work together to rebuild and rediscover the soul of our area," he said. "What we do here is all for the honor and glory of almighty God."

U.S. Catholics Key To Bringing "Sweeping Positive Change" To Haiti's Desperately Poor Rural Villages

After visiting the desperately poor families who live in the rural parts of Haiti, Msgr. Michael Flanagan has dedicated himself to rallying support in America for their urgent needs.

Msgr. Flanagan believes that he and other Americans can play a unique role in the recovery of Haiti's impoverished countryside. He urges U.S. Catholics to seize this opportunity to help this sister parish overseas.

"In Matthew 25:31-46, Jesus gave us a preview of the final judgment, and the power of those words burned in my soul as I walked through the rural villages of Haiti," Msgr. Flanagan said. "When Jesus related the last judgment of mankind, he made the shocking revelation — that help given to the poor would equate to help given to him, and that those who ignored the poor would be judged as if they had ignored Christ himself. The connection to Haiti is obvious to all who will listen. These destitute villages are where Christ abides today. He is there among the poor, calling for our help."

Flanagan also encourages Catholics to see the Judgment story in Matthew as a blessing rather than as a source of anxiety or fear.

"Who among us wouldn't be joyful to serve our Lord if he were to appear here among us now? We shouldn't see our actions in Haiti as simply feeding a child here or building a home for a poor family there. We should see our outreach as a loving response to Jesus himself. That's what's so amazing about our Lord's revelation in Matthew 25. He is showing us a tangible way to demonstrate our love for him here and now — in our modern world," Flanagan said.

"What could be more inspiring than that?"

Flanagan also pointed to other key verses in scripture that magnify the importance of the poor in God's plan for blessing his people.

"Isaiah 58:5-11 is another powerful passage. It explains that we are most pleasing to God when we help the needy and bring relief to the poor," he said. "And it contains a powerful promise to those who reach out in compassion — 'then your light will break forth like the dawn and your wound shall quickly be healed; Your vindication shall go before you and the glory of the Lord shall be your rear guard. Then you shall call, and the Lord will answer; you shall cry for help, and he will say: Here I am!' As Catholics, we rightfully respect the Eucharist and other Sacraments as important means of grace. Here, God is showing us another way we can be blessed — by responding in love to people in need."

Ultimately, a generous response from American Catholics to the needs in rural areas of Haiti could have a tremendous impact, he added.

"If we rise to this occasion and help the poor in these troubled spots in Haiti, we can create sweeping positive changes in those villages. The sick can be healed, the hungry fed — lives literally can be saved," Msgr. Flanagan said. "Remember Matthew 25:31-46. When you feed the hungry and care for the sick in Haiti, you will be responding to Christ himself!"

Thomonde housing — a leaky patchwork of canvas, old plastic and scraps of wood.

Cross International Meets Needs of Haiti Hurricane Victims

In less than a month Haiti felt the impact of four major storms. They devastated cities and towns all over the country, claiming at least 600 lives and leaving thousands without homes or food. Within hours of the first storm's impact, Cross International Catholic Outreach sent thousands of dollars in cash grants to Catholic ministries in the country so they could purchase immediate necessities.

After Tropical Storm Hanna blew by Haiti — dropping sheets of rain and wind that caused flash floods and washed out roads — Cross responded by airlifting food and clean water to Gonaives where people called for help from rooftops where they had climbed to escape more than 12 feet of water.

Widespread flooding from Tropical Storm Hanna and later Hurricane Ike has left many areas completely under water. Around 70 percent of the country's crops have been destroyed, causing Haiti's already-high food prices to spike even higher, and places where homes used to stand are now piles of rubble.

In the months ahead Haiti confronts the massive task of rebuilding, as those who have lost their homes and livelihood start from scratch to survive. The latest estimate is that 86,000 people have been seriously affected by the hurricanes, while hundreds of thousands require some level of aid.

"People have been coming to us steadily for help. They need money to bury their dead.

They need food, shelter, clothes, anything — because everything they have is gone," said Gladys Mecklenbourg, who operates a Cross-sponsored orphanage and school for poor children in the Montrouis area, near Port-au-Prince.

Working with several Catholic ministries throughout the country, Cross has turned its efforts to aid in building homes and providing for the long-term recovery needs so many face in the wake of the devastating storms.

"We have been working through our ministry contacts in Haiti to assess the long-term needs of their communities. Cross is committed to helping them rebuild," said Jim Cavnar, Cross president. "With the help of our faithful donors and other compassionate American Catholics, we can help thousands get their lives back."

Missionaries Seek Support For Their Efforts to Help Haiti's Poor

"Before God sent the missionaries here, we had lost hope," says Roland Dersaint, a 36-year-old father of three. "The children here in Kobonal were dying of sicknesses. Many families were surviving only by eating green mangos. But it wasn't enough to save the weakest. We often saw families walking down the road with tiny coffins — sometimes as many as five little ones would be buried in a single day."

A few years ago, Roland and Mary Dersaint pulled a tiny coffin of their own down the long dirt road. Inside was their nine-month old baby, Rosalie.

"Typhoid took her," Roland explains, looking away to hide his grief.

In the years before the missionaries came, circumstances like these defined life — and death — in Kobonal, Haiti. This isolated section of Haiti's Central Plateau is plagued by hunger, illness and the other marks of extreme poverty. In fact, before the missionaries came, as many as one out of three children died before reaching age five.

Roland and Mary Dersaint's story of loss is very typical in this part of Haiti, according to Father Glen Meaux. When Fr. Meaux and other members of the Society of Our Lady of the Most Holy Trinity (SOLT) came to Kobonal from America more than 10 years ago, they were shocked by the severity of poverty in the Central Plateau. In fact, as the group was driving up to the Kobonal villages for the very first time, they passed a group of families with tiny coffins coming down from the mountains to bury their children.

"It was heartbreaking, but it was also an important experience for us because it humbled us and showed us how difficult life is for the poor. It taught us that our ministry to preach the Gospel must also include a significant outreach to the poor," Fr. Meaux explains.

In the years since, the missionaries have worked hard to bring both the Gospel's hope — and Christ's ministry of mercy — to the struggling families living in Kobonal. At times, they have faced serious, even life-threatening challenges.

"We had some extremely difficult days in the beginning," Fr. Meaux recalls. "The voodoo priests didn't want us in Kobonal, and the poverty we all lived in made it very hard for everyone involved. But this is where God wanted us, and we set our minds and spirits on doing His will," she says. "Today, voodoo is no longer practiced in the areas we serve, and the poor have new hope. God has been good! Because we made a commitment to Him and remained faithful, He has blessed the work of our hands. That's how we see it."

The fact that these missionaries have given up comfortable lives in America to help the poor in Haiti is a testament to their strong faith and abiding love of Christ.

"God created us all — Americans and Haitians. And Christ died for us all. We are all brothers and sisters; His children. As brothers and sisters, we should love one another and share what we have with those in need," the priest explains. "That is what motivates us. And, frankly, it should motivate every Catholic. Expressing compassion and serving others are at the very heart of the Gospel. As Catholics, we preach it and we should be living it out."

When the Kobonal Mission was founded, Father Meaux first sought to eliminate the hunger and malnutrition that plagued Haiti's Central Plateau. His group launched a special program to provide food for the poorest of the poor, including vulnerable women and young children. That program was recently expanded through support from Cross International Catholic Outreach and its family of donors.

After responding to this basic human need for food, the missionaries looked for ways to create a lasting change in the area — ways to help the poor break the cycle of poverty and become self-sufficient.

Fr. Glen working with a Haitian farmer.

"We discovered that many poor families wanted to grow crops, but they had no land of their own to cultivate. We looked for ways to acquire land and to supply these families with the help they needed to begin a small farm," the priest explains.

This idea impresses Cross International Catholic Outreach's president, Jim Cavnar, and he hopes to encourage American Catholics to support the project.

"When I heard about their plans to help these poor families, I immediately thought of that powerful passage in Isaiah 58, where the Lord promises to bless those who respond to the poor with compassion. From verse 6, it reads: 'This, rather, is the fasting I wish: releasing those bound unjustly, untying the thongs of the yoke; setting free the oppressed, breaking every yoke; sharing your bread with the hungry, sheltering the oppressed and the homeless; clothing the naked when you see them, and not turning your back on your own. Then your light shall break forth like the dawn, and your wound shall quickly be healed; your vindication shall go before you, and the glory of the Lord shall be your rear guard.' The Kobonal Mission exemplifies this spirit of mercy in action," Cavnar says. "Cross seeks out partners like this — ministries that are clearly led by the spirit of God, and leaders who find innovative ways to address the needs of the poor."

Cavnar went on to explain the details of the Kobonal Mission farming project.

"Through this program, a poor family receives a half-acre plot of fertile land and a simple but sturdy house. They also get a small subsidy to purchase tools and seeds for the first few years, after which point the farm will allow them to be self-sufficient," Cavnar explained. "The amazing thing is the cost. The total budget for the package is just $6,070 — that's all it takes to provide a family with a small home, land and the tools to begin a little farm."

On behalf of the Kobonal Mission, Cross International Catholic Outreach will be approaching American Catholics and U.S. parishes with this appeal, hoping to find enough sponsors to fund all 41 Haitian families that the missionaries have identified for help in the first phase of the project.

"You need not sponsor the full amount to make a meaningful difference. Every gift, large or small, is important to our goal. For example, a gift of $40 covers the start-up expense for the farm, providing the seed and the use of the oxen to till the land," Cavnar explains. "So you can give $40 and know that your gift has had a big impact on the lives of these desperately poor families."

Broken down, the various parts of the outreach include: $500 for the half acre of land; $5,500 for the house; $40 for the first year subsidy, and $20 and $10 for the second and final year's support.

"We're asking American Catholics to prayerfully consider making a substantial gift to help these Catholic missionaries," Cavnar says. "Father Meaux and his group have a wonderful heart and an amazing plan to help Haiti's poor, but they can't achieve their goals without our help. We need to do our part."

The priest raises his face to heaven, thankful that Cross International Catholic Outreach and its family of benefactors in the U.S. will continue to help the Kobonal Mission develop its outreach to the poor.

"Praise God!" he says. Then bowing his head as if in prayer, he quietly adds, "What a blessing this will be for Kobonal. These poor families have suffered for too long."

budget woes by their parents.

But on the family farm in South Dakota, dust smothered the crops, and one year when plants actually grew the air was thick with grasshoppers. She also remembers many hungry-looking men and women wandering past the farm looking for work.

Now 85, Barnes lives in decidedly undusty Portland, where she raised four children of her own. When she recommends the need to be thrifty, her brood teases her for having "a Depression mentality."

"I think we're more cautious and we're more frugal," Barnes said of her generation. "Also, we are more appreciative of the things we have. We used it up, wore it out and made do."

Her health is excellent; she suffers a few aches and pains and a little blood pressure irregularity. Most days, she walks 18 blocks to St. Ignatius Church in Portland for daily Mass.

As an economic dip not unlike what happened in the 1930s bears down on the United States, Barnes is unperturbed. Many of Oregon's elderly have fretted considerably as the 2008 stock drop has cut into their retirement savings, but Barnes is confident it will bounce back.

She has not bothered looking at her investments, much less moved them.

Many economists agree with Barnes that there will be short-term pain, but that the markets will recover in the next two years. There are safeguards in place to prevent a financial cataclysm like the Great Depression, they say.

"Let's hope so," Barnes said.

Looking back at her growing-up years, Barnes said the family farm was seven miles from the nearest town, which had 100 residents.

The farmhouse had no electricity in the Depression years. She never liked the outhouse and heartily welcomed indoor plumbing when it finally came. Like her sisters, she was a tomboy who milked cows and worked in the fields.

"I really don't know how we managed," Barnes said.

The family had ample food, maybe because they butchered their own meat, raised chickens, baked their own bread and grew vegetables and fruit when the weather allowed. The mother churned butter and sold it to the store for credit.

"Everybody lived pretty simply," she said, "but everyone was in same boat."

To get by, people helped one another. Her father hired workers, mostly farm youths from big families. The Osters took them in, fed them and tended to their clothing.

When dust storms appeared on the horizon, her mother would light a candle and huddle with her children to recite the rosary. As fierce as the summer sandstorms were, winter brought deep snowdrifts that did not melt until April.

Barnes recalled listening to radio programs with her family and hearing results from the 1932 presidential election. She was confident that the new president, Franklin D. Roosevelt, would change American lives profoundly, including life around the Oster farm, where planting trees was required to fight the Dust Bowl and where federal road projects put local men to work.

Barnes joined the Coast Guard during World War II when she was in her early 20s. She came to Portland in 1952, invited by a priest who asked her to do clerical work at a magazine published by the Jesuits. She later worked in banks' loan departments.

She draws a pension from the Southern Pacific Railroad, where her husband, who died 11 years ago, worked for more than 40 years.

To deal with today's economic problems, Barnes prescribes cooperation she remembers from her days on the farm. For example, she admires the idea of community gardens.

Perhaps because of her days of wind, dust and poverty, Barnes is still resourceful and generous. She supports her parish, the Archdiocese of Portland and other charitable groups with significant donations.

She also gives in smaller ways. She often bakes sweet rolls for the parish Bible study and is also sure to make extra rolls for any unexpected guests.

Economic downturn brings call for help for unemployed

"Remember the low- and middle-income Americans whose lives and economic security are being shattered by the current economic crisis."

— Father Larry Snyder

securities firms, the motel industry, appliance factories, shipping companies and steel plants have all cut positions this year.

The staggering economy has delivered a strong blow to the country's poor faced with rising utility, energy, food and housing costs, said Father Larry Snyder, president of Catholic Charities USA.

In a letter this fall to House and Senate leaders, he asked members of Congress to "remember the low- and "unconscionable" that by the end of the year the unemployment benefits will run out for close to 2 million workers.

According to the U.S. Labor Department statistics released Nov. 7, the jobless rate rose to 6.5 percent in October when employers fired 240,000 workers. That figure put the total number of unemployed Americans past 10.08 million, the highest level in 25 years.

More than 22 percent of the nation's unemployed have been out of work for six months or longer — something that also has not happened in 25 years.

One year ago, the jobless rate was 4.8 percent. Many economists are saying the rate could climb to 8 percent or 8.5 percent by the end of 2009.

Job losses nationwide have occurred in a nearly every occupation. Construction companies, retailers, mortgage bankers, middle-income Americans whose lives and economic security are being shattered by the current economic crisis."

He specifically called on them to extend unemployment benefits and to increase food stamp benefits and social service assistance.

While without work

Unemployment benefits were created in 1935 in response to the Great Depression as a means to provide partial wage replacement to unemployed workers while they looked for a job.

Unemployed workers can get these benefits — administered by the states — for up to 26 weeks. On occasion, the federal government has extended the number of weeks these benefits are available. This June, Congress extended the program by 13 weeks.

Congressional Democrats are currently pushing for a further extension of unemployment benefits in a new stimulus package.

Shellabarger said he was looking forward to working with Congress on legislation to help the unemployed even if a larger stimulus package does not get passed.

But he also sees problems with the way unemployment figures are measured and said the system "needs an overhaul," especially since it was designed when people primarily worked 40-hour weeks.

Now, some people work less but want to work more or work on a contractual basis and therefore do not qualify for unemployment benefits.

"How do we make sure people who are part of the workforce yet can't find work get the money they need to feed themselves and maintain shelter?" asked Shellabarger in a Nov. 13 interview with Catholic News Service.

Economists have likewise stressed the need to help low-income families in the complexities of this economic crisis.

Cushioning the blow

Steve Conroy, an associate professor of economics at the University of San Diego, said, "As Catholics, we must consider the human side of this economic crisis, particularly the impact of economic policies on workers and their families."

Tax cuts alone cannot help the country get back on track, said Conroy in an e-mail response to a query from CNS.

Instead, he recommended the government focus on infrastructure development projects, taking a page from President Franklin Roosevelt's New Deal, which was a series of programs that had as a goal the creation of jobs for the unemployed in the 1930s.

Conroy said focusing on public investment projects would reduce unemployment levels and help to jumpstart the economy.

Suzanne Clain, associate professor of economics and statistics at the Villanova School of Business at Villanova University in Pennsylvania, similarly recommended job-creation programs that would grant public service jobs to displaced workers.

She said in an e-mail to CNS that these jobs were preferable to simply extending unemployment benefits.

Clain also emphasized that from the perspective of Catholic social thought the government should be "especially conscious of the economic impact of the crisis on the poor and vulnerable, and should take action — or see that action is taken by others — to cushion the blow."

Books on Sts. Patrick and Francis confirm radical Christian lives

BY NANCY HARTNAGEL
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

WASHINGTON — Though they lived 750 actual years and cultural light-years apart, St. Patrick of Ireland and St. Francis of Assisi, Italy, shared a calling: They lived radical Christian lives because they believed God asked them to.

These two major Catholic saints are the subjects of new books.

"Ireland's Saint: The Essential Biography of St. Patrick" is a new edition of John Bagnell Bury's 1905 biography, "The Life of St. Patrick and His Place in History." Bury was a Protestant Irish historian and scholar of the Greek and Roman empires. His book was regarded as the final word on St. Patrick for the first half of the 20th century.

Editor Jon Sweeney has added throughout the text numerous sidebars that provide information, opinions and sometimes corrections from more recent historians. One note, for example, explains that the Dalriadans and Picts mentioned often by Bury are tribal peoples in the north of Ireland and central to northern Scotland, respectively.

One of the key changes Sweeney made was to the structure of Bury's work, moving his summary chapter on the saint's place in history from the back to the front of the book. Since the remaining chapters put flesh on the bones of Patrick's mission, this was helpful, signaling in brief what readers could expect to find in more detail.

In Bury's account, Patrick did three things in Ireland: "He organized the Christianity which already existed. He converted kingdoms which were still pagan, especially in the west. And he brought Ireland into connection with the church of the (Roman) Empire, making Ireland formally part of universal Christendom."

Sweeney's Patrick is very much Bury's Patrick, a humble, prayerful man who believes he has been called by God to missionary work in the still largely pagan island where he was enslaved as a youth and who toils faithfully for 30 years, circa 432-461, despite severe hardships, repeated dangers and not much support or guidance from Rome.

Bury made this assessment of Patrick: "The man who wrote the 'Confession' and the 'Letter Against Coroticus' had strength of will, energy of action, resolution without overconfidence, and the capacity for resisting pressure from others. ... Perhaps most important, he possessed practical qualities that were essential for carrying through the task that he had been divinely inspired to fulfill."

In "A Mended and Broken Heart: The Life and Love of Francis of Assisi," author Wendy Murray, formerly a senior writer for Christianity Today, asserts that a traditionally overlooked aspect of the story of the founder of the Order of Friars Minor, or Franciscans, is that his relationship with St. Clare of Assisi, the founder of the female arm of the order, the Poor Clares, was rooted in love.

"This love, in turn, evolved into mutual renunciation as each pursued their individual life as penitent religious. This book asserts that their renounced physical love ultimately defined the inner landscape of their devotional lives," Murray writes in the preface.

Though Murray does not, and really cannot, prove this premise, she has crafted a very engaging history of the time as well as compact bios of Francis and Clare. They lived from the late 1100s into the 1200s, a time of danger both in Italy, with constant warring between communes and kingdoms, and internationally, with the Crusades dominating two centuries of Mediterranean politics.

There are other vivid sketches, of friars who collaborated with and succeeded Francis, and of the popes, the emperors and a sultan with whom he interacted. To supplement her text, Murray fills more than 40 pages with maps, a glossary, source material and explanatory notes.

But Francis is the star. Murray recounts familiar details — his playboy youth, renunciation of family, foundation of a new mendicant order and embrace of physical suffering, including the stigmata.

But she also describes the Francis who was brought to trial for stealing from his own father and whose yearlong imprisonment as a POW turned his Round-Table fascination with knighthood into a commitment to nonviolence, even as he participated in the Fifth Crusade.

Here is the Francis who preached naked in solidarity with Christ's humiliation on the cross and who battled his own Franciscan brothers over his more severe rule to govern their communal life.

That Francis and Clare may have considered marrying each other is an interesting idea. However, their shared story that can be documented shows a lifelong interdependence.

As Murray says, "To know Francis truly one must also know Clare."

Readers will find in these biographies no warm and fuzzy images of Patrick and Francis, but portraits of such unwavering Christian saints that their contemporaries "canonized" them even before they died.

Advent is time to watch for the Lord

BY JEFF HEDGLEN
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

I can clearly remember sitting on the front porch with my brother and watching down the street for my uncle's car.

We knew he was coming sometime that day and with him would be our cousins.

We were not a patient duo. We had many plans of forts to build in the basement and, if it was winter, snowball fights to be staged.

These plans burned in our minds and every minute that passed meant one less minute to play.

To keep the boredom at bay we would play tricks on each other. If I caught my brother not looking down the street I would excitedly say, "There they — aren't!"

He would do the same to me when I tired of gazing down the empty street.

Every now and then we would hear a car coming. We would crane our necks to see who it was but be deflated when we realized it was not our uncle.

After the momentary disappointment faded we would go back to watching and waiting.

I think the Gospel writer had this kind of watchfulness in mind when he exhorted the faithful to stay on the lookout for the coming of the Lord.

He said, "Be watchful! Be alert! You do not know when the time will come."

It is impossible to have this high level of watching and waiting every day of our lives. For this reason the church brings us the season of Advent.

It is, in effect, a time when the church sits on the front porch eagerly longing for the coming of the Lord.

Through signs and symbols we are put on alert.

In the Scriptures we wait with the Israelites as they continue their watch for a Messiah.

We also hold vigil with the early Christians as they anticipate (and we still await) the return of Jesus.

Advent is a time to switch gear and, like my brother and me waiting for my uncle's car, we must stay alert and watch, for Jesus is coming. We don't want to miss it!

Questions:

Share a story of a time you watched and waited for something or someone.

What did that feel like?

How can we stay alert and watch for the Lord amid the busyness of the holidays?

Scripture to be Illustrated:

"Be watchful! Be alert! You do not know when the time will come" (Mark 13:33).

Singing Irish priests ink major recording deal with U.S. company

NEW YORK (CNS) — Three priests, who also happen to be diocesan chorists from Northern Ireland, have been signed to a recording contract with a label of Sony BMG for 1 million euros ($1.27 million).

They are the Priests and their debut album, "The Priests," went on sale Nov. 18. They sing sacred music, including "Panis Angelicus" and "Ave Maria."

Their album was recorded, in part, at St. Peter's Basilica in Rome, during a break from their pastoral duties. Each priest is associated with a parish in the diocese of Down and Connor.

Their arrangement with Sony BMG acknowledges the priority of their priestly duties. Their share of the proceeds will be used for their parishes and to support tired priests.

Father Eugene O'Hagan, his brother Father Martin O'Hagan and Father David Delargy began singing together in high school, where their schoolmates called them "Holy Holy Holy" because of their shared goal to enter the priesthood.

They continued singing together while they studied at the diocesan seminary, St. Malachy's College in Belfast, and took voice lessons from a renowned teacher Frank Capper.

When the trio attended the Irish college in Rome, they sang on many occasions, including a Mass celebrated by the late Pope John Paul II.

The priests, all in their 40s, said they were inspired by Pope John Paul to spread the Gospel in new ways.

Father Eugene O'Hagan said, "This has been a privileged time for us in many unexpected ways," and that Bishop Noel Treanor of Down and Connor "is delighted that he has three priests putting the diocese on the map."

He said Bishop Treanor's predecessor, Bishop Patrick Walsh, "was happy to endorse us. He knew we'd been singing since our seminary years."

While in New York, the Priests sang at a private Sony BMG reception held in their honor at Providence, a New York nightclub, which was the Manhattan Baptist Church from the 1920s to the 1960s.

The acoustics in the place are so good it was the home of Media Sound Studios in the 1970s and 1980s, hosting recording sessions for Jimi Hendrix, Billy Joel, John Lennon, the Rolling Stones, James Taylor and other legendary rock performers.

The Priests, wearing clerical garb and standing with their hands at their sides, sang five songs from a small unadorned platform. The cover art for their album, a Celtic cross on a white background, was projected on the windows on either side of the stage.

They were accompanied by pianist Danny O'Neill.

Their performance was introduced by Nick Raphael, managing director of Sony's Epic Records.

"This is not a religious project. It's a project of passion," he said. "These guys are passionate about what they do."

Richard Palmese, executive vice president for promotion for RCA Music Group, said that as an executive he is "excited about the great music and the vocal talents of our three artists."

"As a Catholic I'm proud to be able to support their ministry," he said. "It's a celebration of popular spiritual music and a celebration of the priesthood. The priests are bringing a message to millions through the ministry of song."

Palmese continued, "These are hit songs, spiritual classics we've grown up with, songs that we cherish. It's a very worthy product commercially and spiritually. We need evangelism in these times."

He acknowledged the Priests is not a typical group for RCA and joked that its members were the first artists in his more than 30 years in the business that he can promote without going to confession.

Father Delargy said the three priests were grateful for the encouragement of their confreres, whom he described as "a very strong fraternity of priests. They are delighted for us and very supportive."

The O'Hagan brothers added that their 93-year-old father was "over-the-moon" happy for them and convinced that their recently deceased mother "is having words with God" to assure their success.

Editor's Note: The Priests' Web site, www.thepriests.com, has samples of their music and an interactive blog.

YOUTHS IN ACTION

'A God-inspired party'*High school youths gather for fall retreat*BY KATIE MOORE
STAFF WRITER

DENVER — "The day of the Lord will come as a thief comes at night," said St. Paul in his first letter to the Thessalonians (5:2).

That was the theme for "Grand Theft Nocturnal," the diocesan high school fall retreat, held at Holy Spirit Church in Denver Nov. 14-16.

About 45 high school youths from eight parishes gathered for a weekend of prayer, reflection, presentations and small group sharing.

"I thought that the theme was great for a high school retreat because it talked about topics that high school students deal with on a daily basis," said Megan Meyer, a 10th-grader and parishioner of St. Thomas Aquinas Church in Charlotte.

"We learned about how drug addictions, cheating, lying and other sins can keep us from being ready for when Jesus comes like a thief in the night," she said.

Fellow 10th-grader and St. Thomas Aquinas parishioner Elizabeth Angermeyer agreed that the theme was particularly fitting for youths in this day and age.

"As a young teenager, I know what it is like to feel the pressure to try things," said Elizabeth. "When I am confronted by peer pressure, I remember Thessalonians and remember that God will come."

The retreat took a Scripture-based approach to the topics of sin and grace, vigilance and virtue, and conscience and conversion — all with a continual focus on the importance of staying alert for the coming of the Lord.

"Being ready for God is an important thing to integrate into your everyday life," said Kara Michaels, a homeschooled 10th-grader and parishioner of St. James the Greater Church in Concord. "Just continuously working on being like Jesus, being the best that you can be and giving the glory to God is important."

Beyond the spiritual benefit was a communal bond that was formed by the youths sharing in faith-based activities.

"Going on a retreat is like going to a party — a God-inspired party," said Kara. "Not only do you get to grow closer to God and work on your spiritual life, but you also make a lot of great friends."

The youths also spent time in eucharistic adoration, prayed the rosary, received reconciliation and attended the 11 a.m. Mass at the church on Sunday.

"I think the retreat was a tremendous success," said Paul Kotlowski, director of diocesan youth ministry. "I think everyone who participated grew in knowledge, love and a desire to serve the Lord and his church."

Will we become a secular society?

Bishops care about deterioration of moral values in society

There was a time when the church was convinced that error had no rights. The early bishops in their quest for doctrinal purity were once dismissive of the rights of individuals.

This led to countless abuses: instruments of torture, witch trials, character assassinations and even cruel executions.

The church has long since denounced these abuses. Pope John Paul II even repented publicly for them. Nevertheless, the authority of the bishops has been marginalized ever since.

The recent election is a case in point. The majority of Catholics voted for Barack Obama, the pro-choice candidate, thus exercising their conscience.

When philosopher John Locke proclaimed the primacy of the individual over and above the common good, he sparked an intellectual revolution.

Based on Locke's insights, Thomas Jefferson wrote the Declaration of Independence, and the spirit of American rugged individualism was codified into our being.

Flash forward to 2008. Obama's great victory triggered off a worldwide frenzy. Even though I voted against him, part of me was happy for him and for all those who celebrated his success.

Looking back to the 1960s as a young priest, I remember taking a busload of people to Washington to witness Rev. Martin Luther King Jr. make his "I Have a Dream" speech. I also remember going to Selma, Ala., a few years later to help those who were protesting the voter-abuse scandal.

My sister married a black man, a native Bahamian, and I have black nephews and nieces. I can easily identify with the euphoria felt so strongly by President-elect Obama's followers. I understand their justified pride.

Why then could I not vote for him?

I could not vote for him because he was the most liberal senator in Washington, and he took millions of dollars from the radical side of the Democratic Party, knowing that they would demand payback. They want their secular agenda pushed forward.

The word "secular" means "not bound by any religious scruples."

A friend of mine from New Zealand sent me this e-mail a couple of weeks ago:

"Your situation in the U.S. is very similar to what we face in New Zealand. The Labour Party here has been in office for three terms of three years each, and they have passed legislation that has almost done away with any morality in our country.

"They have legalized prostitution, gay marriages, abortions with no parental notification from 11 years old upwards, lowered the drinking age to 18, tried to introduce euthanasia and weakened the status of marriage.

"Both major parties have made promises of tax cuts and reduced government spending that haven't had any chance of being realized."

In light of all this, I humbly ask you to be watchful. Try to forgive the bishops if you feel any resentment toward them; they are only doing their duty. Jesus Christ has commanded them to be good shepherds.

They care about the deterioration of moral values in our society.

Among other things, the bishops do not want state-assisted suicide to become lawful. Elderly people are already feeling guilty for not dying sooner when they hear their offspring whispering to one another, "This is so awful, Mother (or Father) is using up our inheritance."

Where will it end?

We should all pray for President-elect Obama. I also pray that he will govern from the center, not from the extreme left.

Letters to the Editor

Gratitude for bishops' pro-life stance

Thank God for Bishop Peter J. Jugis and his fellow bishops ("As pastors and bishops: Bishops cite abortion deregulation fears in postelection statement," Nov. 14). Thank God for these brave men of the church.

Recent news reports have indicated that if the Freedom of Choice Act passes, it will require Catholic hospitals and Catholic doctors to perform abortions. As such, the church will close down these hospitals rather than be party to the abomination that is infanticide.

Catholic hospitals represent approximately 1 in 8 U.S. hospitals. Shutting them down would immediately and dramatically degrade healthcare services across the nation.

I hope all Christians and any Americans — who see the slaughter of unborn children as the moral horror it is — will stand with our bishops as they defend the lives of the most innocent and vulnerable among us, as well as religious liberty and 2,000 years of Christian moral teaching.

Bishop Jugis, we're with you!

Postelection aspirations should focus on right to life

Much talk of hope, peace, unity continues in these post-election days ("Making amends: Reconciliation after election possible, but expected to take time," Nov. 14).

We look for change across America — a flowering of respect and dignity for all people, a just sharing of goods, careful stewardship of the environment.

These are great aspirations.

But how do we hope for wisdom to seek peace around the world when we do such violence to unborn babies?

How do we hope for generosity to meet the needs of the poor when we exercise the ultimate selfishness in denying babies the chance to be born?

How do we hope to be good stewards of God's creation when we destroy his greatest creation — the lives of babies?

How do we hope for any good for our beloved country when we offer mothers in crisis the most hopeless act of all — the violent death of their precious sons and daughters within?

Pope John Paul II declared, "A nation that kills its own children is nation without hope."

And yet if we turn to God and repent we can hope that the Precious Blood of Jesus will be a font of mercy to wash away the blood of the millions of unborn babies killed in our country.

Let us dedicate ourselves in prayer and action to seeking the right of every child of God to be born.

Then we can hope and work for true revival in America.

The better way to help the 'common good'

I read with dismay that some Catholic leaders believe President-elect Barack Obama's economic policies "best reflected" Catholic values "hope, personal responsibility and care for the common good" ("Toward the coming challenges: Catholic leaders congratulate Obama, offer prayers for administration," Nov. 7).

Although most Catholics understand Obama's abortion advocacy attacks the inalienable right to life, many others fail to realize that his position on the "common good" likewise infringes on our God-given right to liberty and ultimately will hurt the poor rather than help them.

"Common good" has many definitions among politicians. For many including Obama, it means a false economic equality achieved by forcibly taking property from some and giving to others.

It is synonymous with communism — a godless totalitarian system of government under which the masses live without their God-given right to liberty.

I believe "common good" is best promoted by free enterprise rooted in Judeo-Christian ethics of moral absolutes and the God-given rights the ethics provide.

Our nation, which was founded on these principles, is the most generous in the world — a clear understanding of the "Good Samaritan" parable in which an ethical free enterprise system allows those who prosper to willingly give to those who do not prosper.

A faceless bureaucracy can never replace our responsibility to give of our time, talent and treasure.

We should challenge those around us to live this Gospel message rather than relinquishing this responsibility to the government — which will lead only to the loss of liberty and hurt, rather than help the "common good."

Social tolerance is the new politically correct

Churches can, should speak out and proclaim the truth

The victors of the 2008 election have yet to take office, the losers yet to be defeated (if only from second-tier cable TV interview shows). Now prepare for 2012 and the new buzz word.

It is "social tolerance."

Social tolerance is what 52 percent of California voters, 57 percent of Arizona voters and 62 percent of Florida voters voted to show when approving a ban on same-sex marriage in their states.

"Social tolerance" is a term I first saw in an editorial in the Seattle Times commenting on the tolerance proven in the election of an African-American as president while bemoaning the lack of "social tolerance" on the marriage issues.

But the editorial took some comfort in noting that "other measures of social tolerance failed."

The socially intolerant measures defeated were defeats of a Colorado measure defining "person" from the moment of conception and a measure in South Dakota rejecting a ban on abortion except for victims of rape or incest.

Washington state voters passed by 59 percent a measure to authorize physician-assisted suicide, joining Oregon as one of two states in the nation with such a statute and perhaps leading to a bi-state tourist slogan "People Are Dying to Come to the Pacific Northwest."

Terminally ill patients who wish to end their lives will no longer be outside the law, the Times noted, which is "a gain for tolerance."

The big surprise in the election, however, was that many people who supported Barack Obama also voted in favor of a same-sex marriage ban in California, Arizona and Florida, said Archbishop George H. Niederauer of San Francisco.

"They did not see this as a conservative/liberal issue," Archbishop Niederauer said. "They saw it as a natural law issue."

California's Proposition 8 would overturn a state Supreme Court ruling that granted same-sex couples a constitutional right to marry.

Supporters, in addition to the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, included California's Catholic bishops, some evangelical churches and others.

Social tolerance evidently is not extended to churches and their members.

More than 40 people demonstrated in front of a Latter-day Saint church in Seattle. They lined the sidewalk, chanting slogans such as "Tax the church!" and holding signs saying "Shame on the church" and "All marriages are equal."

Meanwhile, Bishop John C. Wester of Salt Lake City noted the affinity between the Latter-day Saint and Catholic faiths on the sacredness of traditional marriage and the importance of family.

"While acknowledging that this position is not universally held in our society today, our churches are committed to proclaiming the truth, and we cherish our ability to participate in the democratic process," he said.

In addition to being socially intolerant in their protests, opponents are wrong on the facts.

This has nothing to do with the tax-exempt status of churches. While they are prohibited from engaging in partisan political process by supporting candidates, they are free to speak out on issues.

All that churches in California, Arizona and Florida did was to bring their belief to the public square. It was not a situation of churches lobbying legislative bodies or pressuring politicians but successfully making a case that appealed to more than 50 percent of the electorate.

This is little different than a state construction industry association campaigning for a ballot issue to increase highway spending.

Pleas for social tolerance would be more convincing if not coming from people acting badly.

Social tolerance may be a proper term for excusing one who uses the wrong fork at dinner, but not for excusing affronts to human life and dignity.

Faith, charity go hand in hand, pope says at weekly audience

The Pope Speaks

POPE
BENEDICT XVI

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Being saved by faith in Christ alone and not by works does not mean that people can do whatever they want as long as they recognize Christ as their savior, Pope Benedict XVI said.

Faith in Christ "necessarily means conforming oneself to Christ" and being like him, especially in loving and helping others, the pope said Nov. 19 at his weekly general audience in St. Peter's Square.

With an estimated 15,000 people gathered in the square, Pope Benedict continued his audience talks about the life and teaching of St. Paul, focusing on the apostle's teaching about how people become justified or made righteous in the eyes of God.

A dispute over what St. Paul meant when he wrote that people are justified by "faith alone" was at the center of the 16th-century Protestant Reformation, the pope said, but while people are justified by faith alone, true faith always translates into love for God and for one's neighbor.

Here is the text of the pope's audience remarks in English.

Dear Brothers and Sisters,

In our continuing catechesis on St. Paul, we now consider his teaching on our justification.

Paul's experience of the Risen Lord on the road to Damascus led him to see that it is only by faith in Christ, and not by any merit of our own, that we are made righteous before God.

Our justification in Christ is thus God's gracious gift, revealed in the mystery of the cross. Christ died in order to become our wisdom, righteousness, sanctification and redemption (cf. 1 Cor 1:30), and we in turn, justified by faith, have become in him the very righteousness of God (cf. 2 Cor 5:21).

In the light of the cross and its gifts of reconciliation and new life in the Spirit, Paul rejected a righteousness based on the law and its works. For the Apostle, the Mosaic Law, as an irrevocable gift of God to Israel, is not abrogated but relativized, since it is only by faith in God's promises to Abraham, now fulfilled in Christ, that we receive the grace of justification and new life.

The law finds its end in Christ (cf. Rom 10:4) and its fulfillment in the new commandment of love.

With Paul, then, let us make the cross of Christ our only boast (cf. Gal 6:14), and give thanks for the grace which has made us members of Christ's body, which is the church.

Honoring the true king

Feast of Christ the King a time to turn preaching into doing

On Sunday, Nov. 30, the First Sunday of Advent, we will have closed the Cycle A Scripture readings and begin Cycle B readings, and we set aside the year of St. Matthew and begin the year of St. Mark and St. Paul.

This Sunday, Nov. 23, we celebrated the feast of Christ the King, the last Sunday in the liturgical calendar. And it seems that the new liturgical year will be full of pleasant surprises, if we really listen to our king, Jesus Christ.

When we read the Gospel, there is always a story beyond the story — and what we read between the lines may be more important than the printed words.

Let me begin by saying that we as Americans would have a tough time accepting any king. After all, we have never had one and probably we never will. We elect a new president every four years, but a main difference is that a president presides while a king reigns.

However, Catholics across the world proclaim Jesus as king, one whose dominion is based on love, truth and compassion.

At least two other Christian denominations — Lutherans and United Methodists — observe also the last Sunday of the liturgical year under the title of Christ the King. However, this feast is Roman Catholic in origin. The tradition goes back to the 19th century when, amid conflicts and in preparation for the new century, Pope Leo XIII issued the encyclical "Annum Sacrum" on May 25, 1899 in which he dedicated the world to Christ the King, the real king.

Twenty six years later, after the great war had devastated Europe, Pope Pius XI offered another reminder of Christ's kingship — in his Dec. 11, 1925 encyclical "Quas Primas," the pope established the feast of Christ the King to be celebrated on the last Saturday of October.

When the Roman Catholic Church revised the liturgical calendar in 1969, the feast was permanently moved to the last Sunday of the liturgical year.

The concept of God as king also is widespread in the Hebrew Scriptures. And a powerful image of Jesus as shepherd-king is marvelously described in Psalm 23. And in the New Testament,

St. Paul, while in Ephesus around 54-57 A.D., reminds the Corinthians that Christ the King is the new Adam leading them to life, while the first Adam brought death (1 Cor. 15).

Eventually the Gospel makes further development of this topic by focusing on the "preaching ministry" and "doing ministry." It is clear today that talking is less effective than doing and being.

In our Christian lives, being active and contemplative is not an "either or" approach, but a way of life; not a hobby, but an ambition for the privilege to serve, as Christ the King did. By serving others and growing with others, we become like Christ, who humbly washed the feet of his disciples.

So as we celebrate the feast of Christ the King, ask yourself: What is your hobby? What's your ambition?

Former Senate Minority Leader Tom Daschle, D-S.D., applauds during the 2008 Democratic National Convention in Denver in early August.

Daschle chosen to head Health and Human Services

Former senator and Catholic criticized for his abortion support

WASHINGTON(CNS)—President-elect Barack Obama has chosen Tom Daschle, former Democratic senator from South Dakota, to be the next Health and Human Services secretary.

The New York Times reported Obama's choice of Daschle Nov. 19, attributing it to people the paper described as "being close to the transition team."

Daschle, a Catholic, represented South Dakota in the Senate from 1986 to 2004. Before that he was a member of the House of Representatives for eight years.

In the Senate he was minority leader, 1994-2001. In January 2001 he was Senate majority leader for a brief stint, then in May 2001 was again named Senate majority leader, a post he held until January 2003.

Although he has reportedly accepted Obama's nomination, a formal announcement is not expected until other Cabinet members are chosen.

He currently serves as a public policy adviser in a Washington law firm and has been appointed head of Obama's health care policy group. His interest in health care is spelled out in a book he wrote, "Critical: What We Can Do About the Health-Care Crisis," which was published in February.

The book proposes creating a federal health board similar to the Federal Reserve Board. It also recommends expanding Medicaid; expanding Medicare to make it available to all Americans for purchase through a federal insurance pool; and making private health insurance more broadly available through a system of subsidies.

In 2001-03, when Daschle was the Senate majority leader, he was criticized by South Dakota's bishops for his support of abortion legislation, including a bill which at that time would have permitted some partial-birth abortions.

(The federal ban on partial-birth abortion was signed into law in 2003 and upheld by the Supreme Court in 2007.)

In 2002, a year when Daschle was not up for re-election, Bishop Blase J. Cupich of Rapid City, S.D., wrote a letter read at all parishes prior to the November election that criticized the senator.

The bishop said Daschle had been encouraging contributions to the National

"The senator has regrettably crossed the line and I cannot let it go unanswered."

Abortion and Reproductive Right Action League, now called NARAL Pro-Choice America, to support the "election of candidates with pro abortion positions."

"It is clear that the senator has not only aligned himself with NARAL, but he has also made abortion the issue of this year's campaign," the bishop wrote. "The senator regrettably has crossed the line and I cannot let it go unanswered."

The next year, Bishop Robert J. Carlson, then head of the Diocese of Sioux Falls, S.D., encouraged Daschle to reconsider his support for legal abortion but said he "would never break off dialogue or a pastoral relationship" with him.

The bishop was responding to a April 2003 article in the Weekly Standard political magazine claiming that he sent Daschle a letter telling him to remove references to being Catholic in his congressional biography and campaign materials because of his public position on abortion.

Both the bishop and the senator gave only brief statements on the article published in April 2003. In the bishop's statement, he said he had talked to Daschle about his position on abortion and encouraged the lawmaker to reconsider his stand on it as well as his support for NARAL Pro-Choice America.

Daschle responded by saying: "I have been a Catholic all my life and will remain one. Every American's religious convictions are deeply personal and I am not going to participate in a debate that is intended to politicize anyone's religious beliefs."

Leaving a lasting legacy

CHARLOTTE — George and Edith Hilbert wanted to leave a legacy to their values during their lifetime. They loved the Catholic Church, particularly their own diocese, parish and local school, and wanted to make sure that each would benefit from their inheritance after their deaths.

Now, that legacy has been realized through three endowments.

"They lived a very sociable lifestyle — but not a high-end lifestyle," said Patricia Drahos, the Hilberts' niece.

According to Drahos, the Hilberts started investing $40 a month in stock in the 1960s and overtime their investments grew.

BETTERING BURUNDI

Seattle University and the Opus Prize Foundation Nov. 18 awarded the $1 million Opus Prize to Marguerite "Maggy" Barankitse for her work providing safe havens to 30,000 child victims of ethnic strife in the African country of Burundi. She is pictured teaching at Maison Shalom in Ruyigi, Burundi.

Opus Prize awarded to woman who helps child victims of war in Burundi

SEATTLE (CNS) — A Catholic woman who has provided a safe haven for child victims of ethnic strife in Burundi has received the $1 million Opus Prize, billed as the world's largest humanitarian award for social innovation.

Marguerite "Maggy" Barankitse received the honor Nov. 18 from Jesuit-run Seattle University and the Opus Prize Foundation.

Barankitse founded Maison Shalom in 1993 as a home for 25 children orphaned after a violent attack by ethnic Tutsis. It was the first year of a civil war between the Hutus and the Tutsis that would last 12 years.

Burundi continues to recover from the war, which claimed more than 300,000 lives. A half-million people were displaced internally and at least another half-million were driven from the country, according to estimates.

Barankitse's organization has grown into a multiservice agency that runs 500 small houses where children are nurtured and supported so they can be reintegrated into loving families. Maison Shalom also recently opened a hospital.

Seattle University and the foundation also announced two winners of $100,000 prizes: Michael Woodard, founder of Jubilee House Community and Center for the Development of Central America, and Krishnammal Jagannathan, founder of Land for Tillers' Freedom.

Woodward has spent 15 years helping people in Nicaragua become self-sufficient and escape poverty. Jagannathan has spent 40 years fighting for land rights and the self-empowerment of women in Tamil Nadu, India.

"Seattle University is clear about its mission: empowering leaders for a just and humane world," Jesuit Father Stephen Sundborg, university president, said in a statement.

"Bringing these unsung heroes to our campus is a great opportunity to honor their work and provide our students an incredible educational experience by meeting inspiring individuals," he said.

The Opus Prize is a faith-based humanitarian grant awarded annually to an individual or organization of any religious background, anywhere in the world. Recipients must demonstrate a pioneering approach to solving the root cause of social problems in their community.

Shanghai Catholics report seeing smoke from prominent Marian statue

SHANGHAI, China (CNS) — Some Catholics in the Shanghai Diocese said they have witnessed smoke emerging from a bronze statue of Mary holding the Infant Jesus — Our Lady of Sheshan — atop the Minor Basilica of St. Mary.

The incidents took place during the afternoons Oct. 1-5, and each episode lasted one to three hours, local Catholics told the Asian church news agency UCA News. They offered no explanations for what they saw around the 3.8-meter (12.5 feet) statue.

Based on a one-minute video clip provided to UCA News by a layperson, something resembling black smoke appears to emerge from the back of the statue.

This is visible even though the video was shot from the ground up toward the statue atop a 38-meter bell tower.

Fang Linger, a guide for visitors at the basilica, said she saw the smoke Oct.

2 after visitors questioned her about it.

"I told them I didn't know what had happened, but was certain it could not be a fire, because there is only the statue right on top of the basilica," she said.

"There could be reasons and explanations, but it definitely is not human-made," she added.

Some local Catholics believe the phenomenon was a Marian apparition and have prayed at the basilica more often since then.

Others said some seminarians, priests and government officials climbed up to see the statue after reports circulated. They quoted officials as saying the smoke was actually "swarms of insects or bees."

A priest who saw the smoke for days said he believes it was a miracle said the diocese has not conducted any scientific investigation or follow-up, while religious officials said the case was not a miracle and no investigation is needed.

FROM THE VATICAN

Vatican calls for greater vigilance over world's financial operations

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — The Vatican said the current market crisis calls for a new international agreement to effectively monitor global financial operations and give poorer countries a greater voice in economic policies.

In particular, steps are needed to curb the abuses of offshore financial institutions, which many see as one of the causes of the financial meltdown, said a statement drafted by the Pontifical Council for Justice and Peace.

The statement came in preparation for the U.N.-sponsored International Conference on Financing for Development, which was to take place Nov. 29-Dec. 2 in Doha, Qatar. The conference, to be attended by representatives of developed and developing countries, was expected to propose steps to respond to the current crisis.

The Vatican statement said it was important that solutions do not favor rich countries at the continuing expense of poorer countries.

"There is a need to avoid triggering a chain of mutual protectionism. Instead, cooperation should be strengthened regarding transparency and vigilance over the financial system," it said.

"It is important that the political examination among the richest nations, although necessary, does not lead to solutions based on exclusive agreements," it said.

Under the present economic system, it said, "poor countries" are financing "rich countries" through the movement of private capital and government reserves, which are invested in established markets or offshore institutions.

When designing a response, it said, world leaders should follow the principles of subsidiarity and solidarity, which are key elements of the church's social teaching.

188 Japanese martyrs beatified at Mass in Nagasaki

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Christian martyrdom is the fullest expression of human freedom and reflects the supreme act of love, said a top Vatican official at a Mass beatifying 188 Japanese martyrs.

"It is not the punishment or the torture that creates a martyr," but rather the fact the person suffered and died for Christ, Cardinal Jose Saraiva Martins, former prefect of the Vatican Congregation for Saints' Causes, said during the beatification Mass in Nagasaki, Japan, Nov. 24.

The 188 17th-century Japanese martyrs were tortured and killed in different cities between 1606 and 1639 after the Japanese government outlawed Christianity.

More than 30,000 people attended the ceremony in the city's baseball stadium to celebrate the beatification of Jesuit Father Peter Kibe Kasui and 187 companions.

After his Nov. 23 Angelus address to pilgrims gathered in St. Peter's Square, Pope Benedict XVI said the martyrs' beatification marked a significant event for the Catholic Church and all of Japan.

The pope asked people to "rejoice" and pray the beatified martyrs' "victory in Christ over sin and death fill us all with hope and courage."

During the Mass, which was concelebrated by 10 cardinals and bishops, Cardinal Saraiva said martyrs of every age, place and time have all displayed the same dedicated faith in Jesus Christ.

Christian martyrdom "is the fullest exercise of human liberty and the supreme act of love," he said.

Dying for one's faith in Christ is "an act of love toward God and humanity, including the persecutors," the cardinal said.

The newly beatified, all but five of whom are lay adults and children, had been decapitated, crucified, burned at the stake or scalded to death in boiling water. The beatified group included entire families who refused to renounce their beliefs.

By beatifying these men and women the church is underlining the importance of persevering in the belief that only God can save humankind, said Archbishop Joseph Takami of Nagasaki.

The Japanese martyrs also highlight the value of religious freedom and the necessity of facing persecution with nonviolence if there is to be peace, he said.

Cardinal Saraiva said because only five of the 188 newly beatified are missionary priests, the church is sending a strong message to today's young people and laity to strive to live a life of holiness.

Praying for life

Night of prayer for life to be held in parishes around diocese

CHARLOTTE — The National Night of Prayer for Life will be held in a dozen churches in the Diocese of Charlotte Dec. 8-9.

The event is a pro-life prayer service consisting of exposition and adoration of the Blessed Sacrament, recitation of the rosary, silent meditation and Benediction.

"On this evening, we assemble to ask God's help and forgiveness for sins against our most vulnerable brothers and sisters — the unborn," said Maggi Nadol, director of the Catholic Social Services' Respect Life ministry in the Diocese of Charlotte.

Parishes typically begin the service at 9 p.m. on the feast of the Immaculate Conception, Dec. 8, and continue until 1 a.m. on Dec. 9, when Our Lady of Guadalupe appeared to St. Juan Diego in Mexico.

An "hour of unity" is designated for each time zone, so all parishes in the four U.S. time zones can be linked in prayer at the same time. For the Eastern Time zone, the hour of unity is 12-1 a.m.

However, due to unique schedules and conditions, some parishes may adjust the schedule of the service.

"For many years, this event has brought believers into the presence of our Eucharist and our Blessed Mother to pray for an end to the tragedy of abortion," said Father Frank Pavone, national director of Priests for Life.

"Such activity on the part of God's people is a fulfillment of our Holy Father's call in 'The Gospel of Life,' as well as the call of our U.S. bishops, to have more fervent, regular prayer on behalf of life," he said.

WANT TO GO?

The National Night of Prayer for Life runs 9 p.m., Dec. 8, until 1 a.m., Dec. 9. However, times may vary for participating churches. Please call the church for the schedule.

people and I think that says a lot about them," said Drahos.

"They felt they didn't need the money, there were people who did and the church would put it to good use," she said.

In 1998, the Hilberts set up a charitable remainder uni trust. For the next 10 years they lived off the income from that trust.

"Their goal was to do something to benefit them and the church as well," said Jim Kelley, director of diocesan development and director of the Foundation for the Roman Catholic Diocese of Charlotte.

George Hilbert died a few years ago and Edith passed away in March. At the time of her death, the remaining principal of the trust was $362,000.

The principal was split between three endowments: 50 percent went to the Diocese of Charlotte, 25 percent went to Asheville Catholic School and 25 percent was used to establish the very first endowment at their parish, St. Margaret Mary Church in Swannanoa.

"They were outstanding parishioners here," said Father Frank Seabo, pastor of St. Margaret Mary Church.

They were both active leaders in the parish, he said.

"Edith was a lector and George was prominent in helping us and tying into the community at large," he added.

The Hilberts had been living in a retirement community in Black Mountain for the past 20 years.

They didn't have any children of their own, but they were godparents to 18 children, according to Drahos.

"They would have loved to have had children and I think they would have enjoyed them immensely," she said.

Now, children at Asheville Catholic School will benefit from the Hilberts' generosity.

"We will use the income off the new endowment to pay for need-based scholarships, three merit-based scholarships, teacher continuing education and curriculum enhancements," said Bridget Eckerd, head of the educational foundation committee for Asheville Catholic School.

The endowment will allow the committee to purchase equipment for the school such as computers, smart boards and furniture for classrooms that they otherwise wouldn't be able to afford.

"Whenever a teacher needs something, we can say yes instead of no," said Eckerd.

The additional funds coming from the Hilberts' endowment will "help us to continue to do those things at a higher level," she said.

The diocesan foundation is a nonprofit organization established to provide endowments for the diocese and its schools, agencies and organizations.

An endowment is a permanent fund placed in the diocesan foundation that earns income over time.

The original amount is not spent, but the income can be used in a manner stipulated in the donor's estate plan or in an endowment agreement.

Once an endowment is established, anyone may add to the fund. A committee of three to five members is set up for each endowment to determine how funds will be distributed.

"More and more people are doing what the Hilberts did," said Kelley.

"They decided to leave something to the church they love and left a legacy to their faith," he said.

Program explores Bible, God's presence in history

Theological Union, he served at Villanova University as chaplain of the law school and as adjunct theology professor.

The Nov. 20 program's goals were to foster a deeper appreciation of our Catholic approach to the Bible; heighten an awareness of God's presence in the forces of history; and help teachers feel confident discussing the Acts of the Apostles.

"The Bible is true, but let's consider what kind of truth it is," Father Denny told the group.

The Bible is the revealed word of God and teaches religious truth, he said. For example, the book of Genesis contains two creation stories, both of which tell the same truth: God created everything out of nothing.

We need materials in order to create, Father Denny said, but God creates without materials.

Also, "Every language has slang expressions and idioms," Father Denny said. "It doesn't make any sense (to think) that Jesus didn't use slang and idioms."

Slang and idioms cannot be understood literally, he said, and the Bible is no exception. Jesus' statement that, "(I)t is easier for a camel to pass through the eye of a needle than for one who is rich

"The Catholic approach to the Bible is based on good linguistic scholarship."

— Augustinian Father John Denny to enter the kingdom of God" (Matthew 19:24), is just such an expression.

The "eye of the needle" was a low gate that a camel could get through if it got on its knees. Father Denny explained the truth Jesus was teaching is that "it's hard to get to heaven, you must be humbled, scrape your knees, but you can get there."

And, Father Denny added, Jesus wasn't talking about the fabulously wealthy: "By Jesus' standards we're all rich. We're not working for a subsistence living seven days a week."

Jesus was fully divine and fully human, said Father Denny.

"Jesus, fully human, spoke in fully human language," he said.

"It's not the ancient text that changes," Father Denny said. "It's living language that changes. Be open to good scholarly translations. The Catholic approach to the Bible is based on good linguistic scholarship."

A parishioner of St. Margaret of Scotland Church in Maggie Valley chats with her pastor, Augustinian Father John Denny, during a break in his program on "Acts of the Apostles" at St. Charles Borromeo Church in Morganton Nov. 20.

In Jesus' time, there were four groups of Jews: Sadducees, Pharisees, Zealots and Essenes. The Sadducees were the priestly elite. They believed that only the first five books of the Bible (the Torah) were the revealed word of God.

Resurrection, an essential truth of Christian faith, isn't mentioned in those books, so it wasn't essential to the Sadducees' faith.

However, Father Denny said, "The Pharisees accepted most of what we would call the Old Testament. The Pharisees believed in angels, spirits and resurrection. They were very, very taken with the idea that because (Jesus) was preaching resurrection he might be the messiah."

Father Denny pointed out that, "The Pharisees were Jesus' crowd; he had their ideas. Who do you argue with? Your friends. Jesus is so annoyed at them because he wants them to take the next step and come with him."

History and faith

Father Denny's outline for the program explained that the Acts is a "faith history of the first 30 years of the church from its origins in Jerusalem to its establishment in Rome ..."

In Acts we meet Paul, who "repeatedly identifies himself with the Pharisees," Father Denny said. "As a Pharisee, Paul has come to believe that Jesus is the Messiah. 'Messiah' is a Hebrew word, which, translated into Greek and Latin, is 'Christ.' In English it translates as 'the anointed one.'"

"Mary would never have referred to her son as Jesus Christ," he continued. "It was not his last name. Christ is a title: the Christ. The key to understanding Paul is Paul's belief that Jesus is the Christ, the anointed one."

What, exactly, does that mean?

Father Denny pointed out that in Jesus' time, "the world stank." Garbage was everywhere. A person probably bathed only a few times in his entire life. The Jews were the exception and "were considered crazy because of their emphasis on cleanliness."

"The anointed one — the messiah — is the sweet-smelling one, the one who saves us from sin, sickness and death, which are what stink up our world," Father Denny said.

Luke wrote both his Gospel, recounting events in Jesus' life, and the Acts of the Apostles, in which we meet Paul, read about his travels from Jerusalem and eventually to Rome.

"Luke is not an eyewitness to the Gospel," Father Denny said. "Like us, (Luke and Paul) have come to believe in the testimony of others."

Luke wrote for everyone. In the beginning of both his Gospel and Acts, he refers to "Theophilus," which is a made-up name meaning "lover of God."

"Theophilus," Father Denny said, "is all of us."

Luke tells, in Acts 9, how Paul is on his way to Damascus to arrest more Christians when a bright light surrounds him. He falls to the ground and hears a voice.

"Paul's most powerful image of church — the body of Christ — comes from this (voice): 'Saul, Saul, why are you persecuting me?' It's Jesus, totally identifying himself with his followers."

Congolese bishops denounce tolerance of hostilities in their country

Pope condemns atrocities, appeals for peace

BY CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

KINSHASA, Congo — A group of Congolese bishops has denounced the international community's tolerance of increasing hostilities in eastern Congo, which they called a "silent genocide" against the civilian population there.

We are calling on the international community to work sincerely to ensure respect for international law," said the Congolese bishops' committee in a Nov. 13 statement on the war in the east and northeast of Congo.

Decrying the alleged inaction of the U.N. peacekeeping mission MONUC, which the bishops accused of standing by and watching the violence, the bishops said it is "crucial that a peace and stabilization force be sent to re-establish order in our country."

"The situation has reached intolerable proportions which are very worrying and could destabilize the whole region if nothing is done," they said.

Gratuitous large-scale massacres of the civilian population, targeted murders of young people and systematic rapes perpetrated as a weapon of war now are part of the daily routine in the area north of Goma, the capital of North Kivu, they said.

They pointed out that these conflicts between armed groups are taking place where mineral resources are mined.

"It is obvious that the natural resources of ... Congo are fueling the greed of certain powers and these natural resources are not unrelated to the violence now being inflicted on the population," they said.

Referring to the peace accord signed in January 2008 by all the armed groups, the bishops asked, "How is it possible that these accords are being violated without any pressure to force the signatories to respect them?"

Ongoing fighting between rebels and pro-government forces has led to more than 1.5 million refugees. The most recent violence has displaced at least 250,000 people since the conflict flared in August.

Recent waves of "destruction, pillaging and violence of every kind have forced" these people "to abandon what little they had in order to survive," said Pope Benedict XVI Nov. 9.

The pope condemned the systematic atrocities, killings and violence targeting innocent people in Congo and called for all sides to work for peace.

Pope Benedict said his prayers were with those suffering from the fresh outbreak of violence, and he sent encouragement to relief workers, especially from the local churches.

He appealed to all sides to "work together to restore peace in that land (that has been) martyred for too long."

He said the conflict must be ended in a way that is lawful and, above all, respects the dignity of every person.

Meanwhile, Caritas Internationalis, the international umbrella group of Catholic aid agencies, launched an emergency appeal to help tens of thousands of people living "in dire conditions either in camps or in the bush."

While international staff had to be evacuated from the area, local Caritas personnel remain on the ground to support those in need, Caritas said in an Oct. 30 press release.

However, fighting has halted the distribution of planned aid in Goma, it said.

"We're witnessing the escalation of a humanitarian disaster," said Father Pierre Cibambo, Caritas Internationalis Africa liaison officer.

In a Nov. 7 press release, the Jesuit Refugee Service also called on the international community to help reinforce peacekeeping efforts to protect civilians, quell the violence and increase security so aid agencies can have access to those who have been displaced by the fighting.

Proud member of St. James Church

Pastoral letter's peace goals remain unfulfilled

lost, according to some of the country's leading peace advocates.

"It's a different time. It's a different world. But the principles are timeless," John Carr, executive director of the Department of Justice, Peace and Human Development at the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops, told Catholic News Service.

"What the bishops said, what the church continues to say is more important than ever," Carr added. "I think the church these days is more involved in questions of international affairs and in questions of war and peace than back then."

Written during the Cold War as President Ronald Reagan was proposing a new generation of high-tech weapons to secure U.S. military supremacy, the pastoral letter offered world leaders a moral vision on ending the arms race and working toward nuclear disarmament.

The document made clear that possessing nuclear weapons was immoral but offered the notion of conditional acceptance only if such weapons were being held to deter a nuclear attack as long as the eventual goal was disarmament.

In addition, the bishops supported conscientious objection for individuals opposed to carrying arms. They also urged people of faith to turn to prayer, penance and nonviolence to bring peace to family, work and social relationships.

"Our intentions were to change people's minds and hearts and attitudes and that only happens in a very deep way through prayer," said retired Auxiliary Bishop Thomas J. Gumbleton of Detroit.

He was one of five prelates on a committee chaired by the late Cardinal Joseph L. Bernardin of Chicago who wrote the letter.

A sixth partner in the effort was Father J. Bryan Hehir, who today is secretary for health and human services in the Boston Archdiocese. He headed the U.S. bishops' Office of International Justice and Peace at the time. He could not be reached for comment.

The only other committee member alive today, retired Bishop Daniel P. Reilly of Worcester, Mass., said the authors rooted the document in the tenets of the Catholic faith.

A key underlying message, he explained, was respect for the other, which can be found especially in family and community.

"We have to set up human relationships in such a way that we can try to live in peace," he said.

Catholic peace movement

While "The Challenge of Peace" has hardly influenced world leaders to eliminate nuclear stockpiles, Bishop Gumbleton said the document has as much to say about today's "global war on terror" as it did on the morality of launching a nuclear war in 1983.

"I'm convinced we're in a more dangerous situation now than we were even then," Bishop Gumbleton told CNS.

Unfortunately, Bishop Gumbleton and several other peace advocates said, the pastoral letter is rarely cited or discussed today, having largely been relegated to bookshelves and library stacks.

"It hasn't been a part of peoples' consciences as we had intended it to be," he said.

Despite its reduced profile, the document legitimized the Catholic peace movement, which, until the bishops spoke, largely had been relegated to the church's margins.

Organizations such as Pax Christi USA, which had been seeking nuclear disarmament and stressing the practice of nonviolence for years, found wider acceptance as their message was being embraced by the bishops.

A priest says funeral rites Nov. 13 for a Christian resident killed in a bomb attack in Baghdad, Iraq. A car bomb and roadside bomb exploding in quick succession killed 12 people and wounded 60 Nov. 12 in the eastern New Baghdad district of Iraq's capital. The core messages of the U.S. bishops' pastoral letter on peace, issued 25 years ago, include the importance of peacemaking in everyone's life.

Making peace every day

Over the years, the concept of peacemaking in everyday life has been integrated in peace studies programs at colleges and universities and the teaching of conflict resolution skills and nonviolence to students in Catholic schools, explained Franciscan Sister Marie Lucey, associate director for social mission at the Leadership Conference of Women Religious in Silver Spring, Md.

"I think the bishops addressing the nonviolent position was important at that time and is still important today," said Sister Lucey, who represents the leadership conference at Faithful Security, a national religious partnership on the dangers of nuclear weapons.

"That's what we strive for," she said.

One such effort is being undertaken at St. Michael's College in Colchester, Vt., where students can readily learn about the church's long-held teachings on peace and justice.

"So many of the students are thrilled to find out about the theology of peace in the Catholic Church," said Laurie Gagne, director of the Edmundite Center for Peace and Justice at the college.

"They say, 'Why haven't I heard about this before?'" she said.

Gagne said she would like to see the topic addressed in homilies more often so that no one is ever surprised to hear what the church teaches about war and peace.

Auxiliary Bishop Gabino Zavala of Los Angeles, bishop president of Pax Christi USA, agrees that the role of peacemaking is everyone's responsibility.

In an Oct. 9 lecture at Jesuit-run Seattle University as part of an observance of the pastoral letter's silver anniversary, he said the document and Catholic social teaching can still help shift the emphasis of U.S. foreign policy from demonstrating military might to diplomacy.

In an interview with CNS, Bishop Zavala cited the peacemaking example of Jesus as a model for 21st-century Catholics.

"We need to get more involved in the peace movement," he said. "Jesus was a man of peace, not of violence. We have a tradition in our church of promoting peace."

"We can get involved in peace movements and something as simple as praying for peace in our parishes, having peace and justice commissions in every parish, having small groups seeing how they can promote peace in their own communities," he added.

Along those lines, Pax Christi USA is drafting a People's Peace Initiative, which executive director Dave Robinson hopes will reinvigorate interest in the pastoral and widen interest in taking steps for peace from families to the public policy arena.

"It's designed along the same lines as the pastoral. It starts with Scripture and Catholic social teaching and articulates issues from the grass roots and lays out a process for peacemaking for Catholics in the new century," Robinson told CNS.

"Peacemaking begins with the individual human heart and it extends out from there," he added. "If your nonviolence and commitment to peacemaking doesn't extend from you and your family and into the community, and you bypass that and go straight into policymaking, you're missing an important step."

Even as such efforts are under way, the USCCB's Carr said the future of the peace pastoral will depend on how seriously the bishops' call to be peacemakers — the fourth and final section of the letter — is taken by everyday Catholics in their busy lives.

"(Catholics) have gone from knowing little to knowing something (about church teaching on peace). But we need to know a lot more," he said.

"Peacemaking is not an optional commitment, as the bishops state. It's a requirement of our faith," Carr said. "Peacemaking is not simply nuclear disarmament. It's putting an end to violence in its many forms."

Mother Teresa still has lessons to teach world, says priest-author

BY NANCY FRAZIER O'BRIEN
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

WASHINGTON — More than 10 years after her death, Blessed Mother Teresa of Calcutta still has lessons to teach the world, according to the priest who co-founded the Missionaries of Charity Fathers with her and has written a new book about her.

Father Joseph Langford, a 57-year-old native of Toledo, Ohio, said he wrote "Mother Teresa's Secret Fire" to try to explain "what made Mother Teresa Mother Teresa" and how she sustained hope, joy and a belief in the possibility of change in the face of inner and external challenges.

"As America faces its own dark night of the soul," he said, Mother Teresa shows Americans and the rest of the world "how to live joyfully, creatively, in a way that leaves a legacy."

In a Nov. 18 interview with Catholic News Service, Father Langford said Mother Teresa asked him to write the book after she revealed to him in 1986 the details of her "call within a call" 40 years earlier.

On a day in 1946 that she came to call "inspiration day," as she was on a train to Darjeeling, India, to begin a retreat, Mother Teresa heard a call from God to give up her safe, relatively comfortable life as a schoolteacher and as a Sister of Loreto to live among the destitute and dying in Calcutta and establish a new religious community.

"She was not special, she was not unique, she had no special support system, and look what she did," the priest said.

Father Langford, ordained a priest of the Oblates of the Virgin Mary in 1978, was inspired to join in Mother Teresa's work by another book about her, Malcolm Muggeridge's "Something Beautiful for God."

Together they founded the Missionaries of Charity Fathers in 1984; the order has its international headquarters in Tijuana, Mexico.

"My first meeting with her was mediated by a book," he said. "So I wanted to pay forward the blessing of having been close to her for 30 years."

The Albanian-born nun told Father Langford about her transformational experience as they were preparing a constitution for the priests' branch of the Missionaries of Charity.

"There were things I wanted to include in the constitution about her way of seeing things, of experiencing things," he said. After she told her story, she told the priest, "One day you must tell the others."

The revelation that came to Mother Teresa on the train to Darjeeling centers on "the mystery of Jesus' thirst."

Although Father Langford said the concept is too complex to summarize in a few words, Mother Teresa once called it "the depths of God's infinite longing to love and be loved."

"She was convinced that grace was given not only to a few but to everybody — for the poorest of the poor and for the rest of us, as much as we could accept our own poverty," he said.

The book features many of Mother Teresa's own letters and other writings, which Father Langford said show "a tremendous depth of theology that I think is going to surprise people."

He also said many people misunderstood the message contained in a collection of her writings published last year as "Mother Teresa: Come Be My Light."

In the book, Mother Teresa described her own crises of faith and said she felt for many years that God had abandoned her.

By revealing her own inner struggles, Mother Teresa showed others the way out of darkness, Father Langford said, praising her ability to "make life beautiful where it is ugliest."

"I have seen with my own eyes how her message can touch, heal and change lives," he said. "My hope is that her message will transform the reader's life, even as it already has for so many others."

We must listen for God's voice in all places

BY JEAN DENTON
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

Paul was 70 years old before he heard the voice crying out in the wilderness.

He had been a good Catholic his entire life, attending Mass regularly. He was a loving, dedicated husband and father and a successful business executive.

Then, one night shortly into his retirement, Paul heard the voice crying out, first in a dream.

It was so real to him that he listened. But the idea of such a dream was so irrational and unfamiliar that he was embarrassed to recount it to anyone.

However, the dream recurred — several times — and he felt compelled to tell his wife, Chris.

"I dreamed I was building a school. In Guatemala!" he said incredulously (he'd never been to Guatemala).

It seemed a little strange to her, too, to be talking about this dream. But it struck her as significant.

Then the two of them together heard the voice crying out, this time at church in the person of a visiting Haitian pastor. He wanted to build a school in a remote village in his country.

Recognizing the voice, the couple committed themselves to helping their parish fund construction of the school. A few months later Chris became terminally ill and her final, urgent wish was to ensure that the school would be built.

They donated the amount needed.

After Chris's death, Paul, fluent in French, and the Haitian pastor became close personal friends and Paul became deeply involved in the life and development of his Haitian community.

Peter's words in this weekend's readings tell us that God doesn't mind that it took Paul 70 years to get to this place: "With the Lord one day is like a thousand years and a thousand years like one day," he says.

What happened was Paul and Chris made straight the paths of the Lord to enter the life of a Haitian village. Unexpectedly, but just as powerfully, the paths also led to the transformation of their own life with Jesus.

This story was foretold in Isaiah. "A voice cries out ... the glory of the Lord shall be revealed and all people shall see it together ... here is his reward with him."

Paul and Chris listened to the voice, opened the path and the Savior came.

Questions:

What obstacles in your life might keep you from hearing God's voice in an unexpected place? How can you clear the way for Christ to be present in your day-to-day living?

Scripture to be Illustrated:

"The beginning of the Gospel of Jesus Christ. ... Behold I am sending my messenger ahead of you; he will prepare your way" (Mark 1:1-2).

Chance meeting with teacher leads to made-for-TV movie

Shriver says Catholic faith guides how he views world, people

BY MARK PATTISON
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

WASHINGTON—Special Olympics chairman Tim Shriver occasionally dabbles in the entertainment industry. But having just come off a theatrical movie ("The Ringer") for which he served as executive producer, he wasn't casting about for a new possibility.

Then he met Brad Cohen.

Shriver recalls going to Connecticut to speak to a state high school conference in early 2006.

"The topic was diversity and difference. I know I was invited to speak on the topic of Special Olympics," he recalled. "There were about 1,000 high school kids and I was all fired up."

Instead, he went over like a lead balloon.

"My speech fell flat," he told Catholic News Service Nov. 19. "I tried everything I could and I couldn't get it going."

He chalked it up to tired and bored kids and the hall's acoustics, and he started working on his BlackBerry.

Then "Brad comes up and the place goes nuts," Shriver said. "I sort of look up half-embarrassed and half-amazed."

Cohen has Tourette's syndrome — a neuropsychiatric disorder characterized by multiple physical tics and verbal tics — and he was there to tell his story to the youngsters. Despite his affliction, which cannot be cured, he became a successful teacher, and his autobiography landed him a guest spot on "Oprah."

As fate would have it, Shriver and Cohen also were in the same minivan to be taken to the airport for flights to their respective homes.

Shriver said he told Cohen, "I'm not a movie producer by profession, but if you ever want a hand in it (a movie about his life), people would love to watch it. ... It's a got a great message."

It didn't take long for Cohen to agree.

"It wasn't the hardest selling job I'll ever have to do," Shriver said.

The result is "Front of the Class," which will air Sunday, Dec. 7, 9-11 p.m. EST on CBS as a "Hallmark Hall of Fame" presentation. Shriver served as executive producer.

James Wolk, who has appeared on the CBS soap opera "As the World Turns," plays the adult Brad, while Dominic Scott Kay plays Brad as a middle-schooler whose life is clearly miserable until an understanding principal gives him confidence and inspires him to become a teacher.

Patricia Heaton ("Everybody Loves Raymond") and Treat Williams ("Everwood") play his parents.

"When I see Brad, I think a lot of how I see him comes from my education at Catholic," Shriver told CNS, in a reference to the Catholic University of America in Washington.

Patricia Heaton and Dominic Scott Kay star in a scene from "Head of the Class," which will air Sunday, Dec. 7, 9-11 p.m. EST on CBS as a "Hallmark Hall of Fame" presentation. Special Olympics chairman Tim Shriver, a Catholic, is executive producer of the movie.

"For example, for role models, for affirmations and faith. It's not just what you see in church; it's what you see in day-to-day life that matters," he said.

Shriver, who is Catholic, earned a master's degree in spirituality at Catholic University.

"I was and still am very interested in education," he said. "I felt that a lot of children were bringing to the schools that I was with questions of ultimate value — spiritual questions, their purpose in the world, where did they fit in the world and did it matter."

His prior training in education didn't supply those kinds of answers, "so I went to study the spiritual development of children," Shriver said.

"It proved to be one of the turning points in my life to read the mystics and learn from them," he said, and learn about "the deep and profound ways the spirit emerges from the heart, a way of looking at faith from the inside out. ... I have a huge debt of gratitude to Catholic (University) for the training I got there."

Asked about the seemingly ever-expanding Kennedy clan of which he's a member, Shriver acknowledged it's tough to keep up with all his kin.

"The people I'd like to see more are my wife and kids. I have two children in college, one doing a high school year abroad in Beijing, and an amazing wife, and I don't see them enough," he said.

"My folks (Special Olympics founder Eunice Shriver and one-time Peace Corps and Job Corps director Sargent Shriver) are still alive and still in Washington and I'd like to see them more," he added.

Rattling off the names of cousins, he said, "My cousin Teddy up in Connecticut, my cousin Caroline (Kennedy Schlossberg) in New York — we have a wonderful time together. I'm very blessed. My brothers and my sister are my best friends."

"I do wish we had a little bit more of a focus in our family system on downtime, but that just wasn't in the training program," he added.

Bishops note Obama's historic win but worry about his abortion policy and significant moment" and another expressing hope it will usher in "a new era of racial harmony."

However, many bishops—including Bishop Peter J. Jugis of Charlotte—also expressed caution, warning that the new president could further divide the country if he supports legislation that would change regulations on abortion.

In statements and in columns published in their diocesan newspapers in late November, a number of prelates echoed the postelection statement released Nov. 12 by the body of Catholic bishops during their annual fall meeting.

In that statement, the bishops emphasized their concern about the possible passage of the Freedom of Choice Act during the Obama administration, calling the legislation "an evil law that would further divide our country" and adding that the church "should be intent on opposing evil."

Bishop Jugis, in a Nov. 25 statement to The Catholic News & Herald, said the "intentional destruction of an innocent human being is gravely immoral."

"It will be necessary for all of us to contact our representatives, our senators and President-elect Obama to express our firm opposition to the Freedom of Choice Act," he said.

Versions of that measure have been introduced in Congress since the early 1990s.

The latest version, introduced in April 2007, would establish federal protection of abortion as a "fundamental right" throughout the nine months of pregnancy, regardless of existing state laws to restrict it.

In a January 2008 statement, Obama said he would support this legislation.

Bishop Jugis said he will participate in a 54-day rosary novena Nov. 30-Jan. 22 to pray for Obama and Vice President-elect Joseph Biden "that they have changes of heart and not proceed down the path of more anti-life policies and legislation for our country."

In their individual statements, the other bishops reiterated concern about the Freedom of Choice Act.

Baltimore Archbishop Edwin F. O'Brien called Obama's support of the Freedom of Choice Act a "particular concern to Catholics and others seeking to promote a culture of life."

In a Nov. 11 column in The Catholic Review, Baltimore's archdiocesan newspaper, he also said it was critically important for people to voice their "grave concerns" to elected officials regarding this "uncompromising legislation."

Bishop Paul S. Coakley of Salina, Kan., said he hopes the president-elect "will recognize that this bad legislation would immediately alienate tens of millions of Americans who are passionately committed to the protection of human life from conception to its natural end."

"The intentional destruction of an innocent human being is gravely immoral."

— Bishop Peter J. Jugis

"Signing any such law would undermine (Obama's) pledge and ability to unite our divided nation," he added in a statement published in the Nov. 21 issue of Salina's diocesan paper, The Register.

Similarly, Archbishop Alfred C. Hughes of New Orleans Nov. 15 criticized Obama's promise to sign the Freedom of Choice Act. The archbishop said the legislation threatens the dignity of "our unborn brothers and sisters."

He also said he hopes the president-elect would "see the wisdom of uniting our nation in support of life at all stages and to include the unborn among those this country respects and protects."

The Catholic vote

At least two bishops also reflected on how Catholics voted in the presidential election:

Bishop Samuel J. Aquila of Fargo, N.D., noted that during the election campaign he was "surprised and saddened at how little some Catholics know and accept the teaching of the church on the matter of abortion."

He said he received messages from Catholics complaining that he hadn't "spoken forcefully enough" in opposition to a candidate's abortion stance, while others described themselves as "Catholic and pro-choice," which the bishop described as "impossible."

In his column for the November issue of Fargo's diocesan paper, New Earth, Bishop Aquila also said there had been a "misunderstanding among some Catholics that abortion is just one issue among many issues."

He said Catholics should be concerned about the economy, immigration, the war in Iraq and health care, but noted that "the right to life, from the moment of conception until natural death, is the first among all rights."

Bishop Nicholas DiMarzio of Brooklyn, N.Y., took issue with what has been described as the "Catholic vote," noting the different voting patterns among Catholics who are regular churchgoers and the entire Catholic population.

He said 58 percent of Catholics overall voted for Obama while 49 percent of weekly churchgoers did.

In a column in the Nov. 22 issue of The Tablet, Brooklyn's diocesan newspaper, he stressed that although bishops and priests can help form consciences, they do not endorse candidates or "tell people for whom to vote, although we can indicate the moral issues and the candidates' stands."

Healing the divide

In reflecting on the historic nature of the '08 election, many of the bishops said they hoped the nation's first African-American president might begin to heal the country's racial divides.

Bishop DiMarzio said the election could be a sign that we are "overcoming the evil of racism and Bishop W. Francis Malooly of Wilmington, Del., said in a Nov. 13 statement he hoped Obama's presidency would "help initiate an ever-deepening process of racial reconciliation in our country, the history of which has been scarred by slavery, segregation and racism."

Bishop Coakley said Obama's election "has struck a profound chord within our nation's consciousness." In his statement, he also noted that whether or not people voted for Obama "he will soon become our president."

"We owe him our respect, our support and our prayers," he added, calling the task before him "formidable."

Cooperative spirit

Other bishops likewise noted that the president-elect faces immense challenges and needs support and prayers along with a cooperative spirit.

Archbishop Thomas J. Rodi of Mobile, Ala., said the new president "will inherit great challenges" such as the threat of wars, the possible proliferation of nuclear weapons, hunger, sickness, poverty and economic difficulties.

"Addressing these challenges will not be easy," he said, adding that "we need to pray for our president."

Writing in the Nov. 21 issue of The Catholic Week, the archdiocesan newspaper, Archbishop Rodi added that the "future welfare of our nation calls us to work together."

He said he was confident the country could become more unified under Obama's leadership but only if the new president focused primarily on economic issues.

"If, on the other hand, he pursues an agenda of seeking to undermine traditional marriage and respect for life, as some of his supporters strongly desire, he will alienate millions of Americans from his administration and exacerbate the divisions in our nation," the archbishop wrote.

"Let us pray that he will bring us together," he said, "especially when so many of us wish him well and want him to succeed."

Marking the 20th anniversary of World AIDS Day

Caritas president says more work needs to be done

This Dec. 1 marks the 20th anniversary of World AIDS Day. This day of official reflection by the international community offers the opportunity to assess the successes and failures in combating HIV/AIDS, and to reflect on what lies ahead in this struggle.

The Catholic Church, as a member of the world body of nations and as the largest provider of charitable and health services to people infected and affected by HIV/AIDS, also sees World AIDS Day as an opportunity to reflect on its efforts in this struggle and on how it might be a more effective voice in the world forum as an advocate for those who suffer.

In a Nov. 18 statement, Honduran Cardinal Oscar Rodriguez Maradiaga of Tegucigalpa, president of Caritas Internationalis, the international organization of 162 national Catholic charities, offered these words for World AIDS Day 2008:

"Despite some progress, HIV is a major obstacle to achieving the Millennium Development Goals [MDGs]. The pandemic causes incalculable human suffering. It threatens the social and economic infrastructure of the human family. More needs to be done."

The MDGs are eight goals agreed to by world leaders in 2000 that, if achieved, will move hundreds of millions of people out of poverty by 2015. International development activity today is framed by the MDGs and their associated benchmark targets.

Combating HIV/AIDS and other devastating diseases such as malaria and tuberculosis is the sixth MDG.

Achieving this goal will be no easy task, for the human immunodeficiency virus (HIV) has proven itself to be one tough virus. It successfully hides as it spreads from host to host before immune system collapse occurs — causing acquired immunodeficiency syndrome (AIDS).

It takes advantage of other health maladies (such as, malaria, nutritional deficiencies, sexually transmitted diseases) to spread faster. The antiretroviral therapy that has saved millions of lives is very costly, required for life and must be administered through a vigilantly followed regimen.

Progress toward an HIV vaccine has been frustratingly slow. There is no cure.

The Catholic Church has stressed in its long, committed fight against HIV/AIDS that morally licit behavior modification strategies — such as, fidelity within marriage and abstinence outside of marriage — be promoted.

The U.S. bishops were successful in their advocacy goal that U.S. faith-based organizations — such as Catholic Relief Services (CRS) — receiving government funding not be required to promote HIV/AIDS reduction strategies in conflict with their moral teachings.

In July, a bill reauthorizing the President's Emergency Plan for AIDS Relief (PEPFAR) was passed, providing $48 billion over five years — nearly triple previous PEPFAR funding levels. PEPFAR is producing results — HIV/AIDS deaths have fallen from 2.2 million people in 2005 to an estimated 2 million people in 2008.

In response to PEPFAR's reauthorization, Bishop Thomas G. Wenski of Orlando, Fla., chairman of the U.S. bishops' Committee on International Justice and Peace, stated, "We welcome the retention of abstinence, fidelity and partner reduction, which have proved highly effective in curbing the spread of HIV in many countries, as major components of HIV prevention education."

CRS remains a significant recipient of PEPFAR funds, offering a continuum of HIV/AIDS services around the world that adhere to the Catholic Church's moral teachings. Such services include testing, medical intervention, nutritional support, family and orphan care, and care to people in the last stages of AIDS.

Cardinal Rodriguez's closing remarks in commemoration of World AIDS Day 2008 present the task before the church as it combats HIV/AIDS.

He stated:

"We advocate at all levels for an end to discrimination and policies that are sensitive to the needs of those most vulnerable to the pandemic. Part of the essential 'capital' of the poor person is good health. We will be committed to raising those assets."

Please join with the church's efforts — in prayer, in solidarity with those who suffer and in your generous giving to organizations such as CRS — to bring good health to the world's poor.

Bringing the food forward

Filling food pantries for a hungry winter in America

The woman who got the last package of hamburger from the food pantry's refrigerator began to cry softly. As she received her bags of beans and rice, she continued to murmur about how that gift of meat proved to her that God was still with her.

If I had any doubt that my new volunteer job at our local Catholic Social Services' food pantry would have touching moments, those doubts evaporated when I saw the first tear fall.

This is going to be a hungry winter in America. Financial calamity and hunger arrive at the front door of the poor first. And I'm meeting some of that hunger face to face every Monday afternoon.

The young, slight Sudanese man, his young daughter in tow, spoke almost no English. He had to look carefully at the pictures on vegetable cans to see which variety of his allotted two he should pick.

But his little daughter understood my comments enough to respond with a huge smile when told how pretty she was; she then opened her coat to display a brightly colored dress of which she was obviously very proud.

Then there was the woman who declined the box of cereal because, she said, "I don't have any milk." Fortunately, I was able to tell her the pantry had a gallon of milk for her that day.

There was the woman who couldn't believe her good fortune in being handed a bag of freshly ground coffee.

"I've been craving coffee," she confessed.

I realized then why it was good for me to be in the food pantry. Because even though I don't think of myself as rich, I treat myself to a gourmet latte every now and then.

And more than that, I wake up every morning knowing that if I want to splurge at my neighborhood coffee shop, I can.

That's the big difference, you see. I can. And if my kids want a bowl of cereal and I'm out of milk, I drive from my heated garage to the store and buy a gallon.

For the Journey

EFFIE
CALDAROLA

I can. And I have never experienced the frustration and sorrow of having to say to my kids, "I can't."

This pantry is not like shopping at your local supermarket. The shelves are sometimes nearly bare, and what's there is largely government-issue food. There's rarely anything fresh, and the meat the woman received was a rare treat indeed.

The nun who works at the agency told me that one day the waiting room was nearly full, and she had to announce that all they had left were bags of beans and rice.

"Almost no one left," she said. "You know people are genuinely hungry when they'll wait an hour for a bag of beans and some rice."

People check in when they arrive. At least yearly, they provide identification for family members and proof of income.

They are allowed to shop only once a month, and then a "personal shopper" (me, for one) accompanies them and helps them choose so much canned fruit, so many proteins, so much dairy, based on their family size.

I think of Christ feeding the crowd who came to hear him. He blessed the fish and the bread, but he wasn't the one who brought it to the gathering. Someone else brought it forward and was willing to share.

What would Christ have done that day, I wonder, if no one had come forward?

This is going to be a hungry winter, and there's a food pantry in every town. Let's bring the food forward.

No time to bury our heads in the sand

Prudence needed to overcome problems, difficult times

"When your monthly stock market statement comes, don't look at it!"

During the last few months, we have experienced the stock market tank, an enormous loss of jobs, businesses collapse and the general sinking of the economy. A natural human reaction is to look away from it.

To numb the fearful impact of disturbing events, some people take to drinking and others to their beds, hoping that when they are conscious again everything will be better.

Some even fall into utter despair and still others go so far as to take their lives because they feel there is nothing more to live for.

Where do we turn in order to counter this malaise?

At the same time economic woes have been bombarding us, several apropos Gospel passages offer the exact counsel we need to remain strong and hopeful.

Earlier in November, for example, one of the Mass readings was from Luke 14:25-33. Christ is speaking here of a king sitting down to weigh what he needs to do in light of a large army coming against him.

Two days later, the Gospel reading for the Mass that day was taken from the Luke 16:1-8. It presents Christ speaking of the steward who had squandered his master's property.

The steward is praised for sitting down and lowering the debts of the master's debtors: "And the master commended that dishonest steward for acting prudently."

In both readings, Christ invites us to look into the minds of the two men and how they took stock of their situations. Their minds are not running from the problems. Rather, they are working feverishly to solve them.

They are anything but unconscious and in disarray.

A principal quality of prudence is clear-sightedness, which means not flinching in the face of difficult situations. Prudence encourages us to utilize the best of our reflective powers in sorting out problems in order to make wise judgments.

Prudence also prompts us to take action, to avoid sitting around moping. It is the direct antithesis of aimlessness and succumbing to despair.

No doubt about it, we are in very difficult times! To make matters worse, the sinking economy is global, which adds to our fear of losing control over it.

Like St. Peter, who found himself sinking after walking on water, we too are experiencing that sinking feeling after having been buoyed up by the economy.

No better time exists today for taking to heart Christ's affirming words, "Fear not!"

We live at a crucial moment in history that is calling us to raise our thinking powers to new levels and to practice the strengthening virtues of hope and prudence we received in baptism and were reconfirmed in confirmation.

Real faith shows itself as love for others, pope says at audience

The Pope Speaks

POPE
BENEDICT XVI

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — If Christian faith is not translated into love and concrete help for the poor, it is not real faith, Pope Benedict XVI said.

"Real faith becomes love and expresses itself in charity. A faith without charity, without this fruit, would not be true faith. It would be a dead faith," the pope said Nov. 26 at his weekly general audience.

The gathering was held in the Vatican audience hall on the first day solar panels installed on the roof began generating energy for the Vatican's power grid.

In his main talk, Pope Benedict continued a discussion he began the week before about St. Paul's teaching on how people are made just in the eyes of God and on the relationship between faith and good works.

St. Paul taught clearly that people can do nothing to make themselves just in the eyes of God, but rather that justification is God's gift to those who believe, the pope said.

"But this faith is not a thought, an opinion or an idea," he said.

Here is the text of the pope's audience remarks in English.

Dear Brothers and Sisters,

In our continuing catechesis on St. Paul, we now consider his teaching on faith and works in the process of our justification.

Paul insists that we are justified by faith in Christ, and not by any merit of our own. Yet he also emphasizes the relationship between faith and those works which are the fruit of the Holy Spirit's presence and action within us.

The first gift of the Spirit is love — the love of the Father and the Son poured into our hearts (cf. Rom 5:5).

Our sharing in the love of Christ leads us to live no longer for ourselves, but for him (cf. 2 Cor 5:14-15); it makes us a new creation (cf. 2 Cor 5:17) and members of his body, the church.

Faith thus works through love (cf. Gal 5:6). Consequently, there is no contradiction between what St. Paul teaches and what St. James teaches regarding the relationship between justifying faith and the fruit which it bears in good works.

Rather, there is a different emphasis. Redeemed by the precious blood of Christ, we are called to glorify him in our bodies (cf. 1 Cor 6:20), offering ourselves as a spiritual sacrifice pleasing to God.

Justified by the gift of faith in Christ, we are called, as individuals and as a community, to treasure that gift and to let it bear rich fruit in the Spirit.

Supporting and challenging the president-elect

Catholics must forcefully weigh in on moral issues facing humanity

With the United States and the world in so much trouble, a lot is riding on President-elect Barack Obama.

And with inauguration day less than two months away, Obama's agenda is quickly solidifying. Before it is set in stone, millions of U.S. Catholics need to forcefully weigh in on the numerous moral issues facing humanity.

Many of Obama's positions reflect Catholic social doctrine and deserve our support.

For instance, his desire to provide affordable, comprehensive health care for the nation's uninsured — including almost nine million children — is in line with the Catechism of the Catholic Church.

His plan to annually increase the minimum wage supports church teaching concerning each worker's right to fair compensation.

Obama's commitment to diplomacy in the Middle East, and to ending America's combat role in Iraq, is a major step in the direction of the Gospel's teaching on reconciliation and peace.

However, the president-elect needs to develop a similar diplomatic and exit strategy for Afghanistan. Sending additional troops there is a mistake. Instead, creative, peaceful ideas are needed.

Obama's goal to have Russian and American nuclear missiles removed from "hair trigger" alert, and to eventually eliminate all nuclear weapons, powerfully reflects Catholic teaching. But his determination to rely on nuclear deterrence in the interim does not.

The president-elect's proposal of doubling foreign assistance to the world's poor is an improvement, but not as generous as it may sound.

According to the Christian anti-poverty organization Bread for the World, the United States in 2007 gave a total of $14 billion for poverty-focused development assistance — which is only 0.5 percent of our federal budget.

Pope John Paul II warned America not to be content to give just the crumbs from our feast to the poor.

According to the World Bank, 1.4 billion human beings live in extreme poverty — struggling to survive on less than $1.25 a day. Even during these difficult economic times, we can allocate much more than a 0.5 percent budgetary increase to help our suffering brothers and sister.

Christ expects better from us!

We need to challenge ourselves and President-elect Obama to share far more of our wealth with the world's poor.

Very troubling is Obama's strong pro-abortion stance.

He hopes to sign into law the Freedom of Choice Act. If passed by Congress, this legislation would cancel even modest abortion restraints like parental notification laws.

It would forbid banning partial-birth abortions and would even deny legal protection for an infant born alive after a failed abortion!

During their recent meeting in Baltimore, the U.S. Catholic bishops unanimously agreed to mobilize the resources of the Catholic community to prevent the passage of the Freedom of Choice Act.

One easy step we can take immediately is to call President-elect Obama (202-540-3000 and press 2) or, preferably, contact him at www.change.gov and go to "American Moment" at the top of the page.

Click "Share Your Vision." In the comment section please explain why you object to Obama's support of abortion and the Freedom of Choice Act. Urge him to agree to dialogue with the pro-life community.

Also request that he pursue diplomacy in Afghanistan and abandon his intentions to deepen our military involvement there. And ask him to triple poverty-focused assistance to the world's poor in 2009.

Now is the best time to help President-elect Obama understand the moral concerns of America's Catholic community!

To help the hungry

Study: Overseas aid needed to keep poor from falling further behind

BY MARK PATTISON
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

WASHINGTON — Officials from a variety of nongovernmental organizations have urged the United States to continue overseas development assistance despite the current global financial crisis.

One official at a Nov. 24 press conference in Washington said relieving hunger in poor nations could be seen as a national security issue.

At the press conference, marking the release of the 19th annual hunger report by Bread for the World, speakers noted that 100 million more people went hungry earlier this year because of fuel and food price spikes, coupled with the growing of crops for fuel rather than for food — and an additional 100 million have gone hungry since the financial crisis started in September.

"Investing in food production in Africa is a security issue," declared Peter McPherson, a former U.S. Agency for International Development director, during the press conference. "Food production, in my mind, is a security issue."

"We started sensing that something was seriously wrong" a little over a year ago, said Ken Hackett, head of Catholic Relief Services, the U.S. bishops' overseas relief and development agency.

One sign was when sisters who were Missionaries of Charity would come to CRS outposts. "When the Missionaries of Charity come to your door, they don't leave," Hackett said during the press conference. Their presence was an indication that "the poorest of the poor could no longer feed themselves."

Another sign came during his visit to CRS workers in Haiti.

"When you stand up before 200 of your workers in Haiti, and you give your speech and you thank them for all the good work that they're doing, and the first hand that goes up says, 'When are we going to get a salary adjustment?' you know something's wrong," Hackett said.

"It's even affecting our own people on the ground," he said.

Concern for the poor and the vulnerable "must be at the foundation of any assistance," he added. Overseas development assistance, as currently constituted, "is not responsive in any way to the needs of the poor."

A chart distributed at the press conference showed 50 foreign assistance objectives, 51 U.S. governmental foreign assistance organizations — Cabinet departments among them — and 48 presidential initiatives, pieces of legislation and strategy papers.

McPherson called for an overhaul of the bureaucracy; the Obama transition team has been approached with the idea of a Cabinet-level Department of Global Assistance. "There's nothing like money to dictate where the control is," McPherson said.

Foreign assistance "is not addressing the root causes of poverty," Hackett said. It must integrate food aid and development aid, and "it's imperative that the United States supply, even in tough times, adequate assistance."

The U.S. role in development aid has slipped over the past 20 years "because we're now into immediate emergency relief," McPherson said.

Joy Phumaphi, the World Bank's vice president for human development, said the World Bank was prepared to give $6 billion in farm aid to developing countries, but added that the figure was 10 percent of what was needed worldwide.

Rekha Mehra, economic development director for the International Center for Research on Women, said that "860 million people are going to bed hungry every night." She said women in sub-Saharan Africa produce 60 percent of the region's food, but that only 6 percent of overseas development aid went to women in agriculture.

In October Mehra co-wrote a paper titled "Women Help Solve Hunger. Why Is the World Still Waiting?" In it she said: "Women's education has the greatest effect on reducing child malnutrition, accounting for 43 percent of the reduction in malnutrition in the developing world from 1970-1995."

The executive summary of the Bread for the World hunger report showed the inequality of aid and trade.

"In 2006, Bangladesh received $80 million in U.S. assistance, while the United States collected $487 million in tariffs on imports from Bangladesh," it said. "The United States has been working to increase the competitiveness of Bangladeshi businesses, yet U.S. tariffs make exports from Bangladesh less competitive."

Catholic co-sponsors of the Bread for the World hunger report included the Bon Secours Health System; Catholic Charities USA; the Catholic Health Association; SC Ministry Foundation, which is an agency of the Sisters of Charity of Cincinnati; and the Sisters of St. Joseph of Orange, Calif.

VATICAN CITY — In their prayers and through their actions in Advent, Christians are called to be signs of hope for a world marked by holiness and justice, Pope Benedict XVI said.

"Advent is the spiritual season of hope par excellence, when the whole church is called to become hope for itself and for the world," the pope said Nov. 29 as he celebrated vespers on the eve of the first Sunday of Advent.

PRIESTLY PEACE

Jesuit Father John Dear listens to a question during an interview at Emory University in Atlanta Nov. 20. The long-time peace activist was in Atlanta to promote his new book, "A Persistent Peace." Father Dear was recently nominated for the 2008 Nobel Peace Prize.

Jesuit priest says his life is a journey toward the 'God of peace'

ATLANTA (CNS) — As a young Jesuit, Father John Dear chose to add his own vow of nonviolence to his order's required vows of obedience, poverty and chastity.

The vows still guide his life more than 25 years later, but after the initial thrill of making his public commitment to them he learned the hard work had only just begun.

"The vows are the beginning of the journey," he said. "I didn't know that. I thought it was the end. I have to keep experimenting."

A life of "peace, love and nonviolence is a journey. There is no reaching perfection," he said during a Nov. 19 lecture at the Jimmy Carter Library and Museum in Atlanta.

His appearance was part of a nationwide book tour for his autobiography, "A Persistent Peace: One Man's Struggle for a Nonviolent World," which has sold 14,000 copies since it was published in August.

Father Dear, recently nominated for the 2008 Nobel Peace Prize, said people need "to see life as a journey, every day mindfully, one step at a time, living and breathing in the Holy Spirit of peace and walking the road to a new future of peace and the God of peace."

The priest described people in the peace movement as the "new abolitionists," imitating people who held firm to their beliefs as they opposed slavery. Even though they were told slavery is in the Bible and that it had always been around for generations, they persisted in fighting for change.

"They were faithful to the journey.

They never gave up," he said.

Father Dear, 49, knows what that is like. He has been involved in war protests, organized chaplains in New York after the 9/11 terrorist attacks and sat in sackcloth and ashes in the biblical tradition of repentance to protest nuclear bombs.

He has visited war zones throughout the world, including El Salvador, Guatemala, Nicaragua, Haiti, the Middle East, the Philippines, Northern Ireland and Iraq.

"War is not the will of God. War is not blessed. War is never justified," the priest said.

He told the Atlanta audience that a spiritual pilgrimage he made to the Holy Land in 1982 changed his life. The priest arrived just as war erupted between Lebanon and Israel and he witnessed fighter planes flying over the Sea of Galilee to drop bombs.

"I made my decision that I was going to spend my life trying to practice and teach the Sermon on the Mount," he said.

The priest told the church audience that his life continues to be a "journey toward peace."

"After all these years of working, the journey to peace is still the most important thing, greater than any one event or success," he added.

"Nonviolence involves active derring-do, confronting the opponent nonviolently," he said. "Peace is not just a tactic or a strategy. It's a whole new way of life."

"Jesus didn't say, 'Blessed are those who like peace.' He said, 'Blessed are the peacemakers,'" Father Dear said.

Catholic Charities USA warns against fraudulent e-mails on Internet

WASHINGTON (CNS) — Catholic Charities USA officials have demanded that groups using the Catholic Charities name to solicit funds on the Internet discontinue using the trademark and urged potential donors to research the authenticity of an organization before making a contribution.

"Fraudulent e-mails that are misappropriating the name of Catholic Charities USA and its affiliates are being sent to extract money and/or personal information from unsuspecting recipients and are circulating on the Internet," Brandon Pinney, Catholic Charities USA spokesman, said Dec. 1.

The e-mails are labeled with the subject titles "Grant Notification," "The Catholic Charity," "The Catholic Charity Foundation" and "From the Office of the Cash Grant Program."

The name "Catholic Charities" was used within the body of some of the e-mails.

The messages — which come from several different e-mail addresses and provide a variety of contact names — ask recipients for detailed personal information.

In an effort to stop the e-mails, Father Larry Snyder, Catholic Charities USA president, replied Nov. 26 to each of the addresses brought to the organization's attention, insisting the sender stop disseminating such confusing messages or suffer consequences.

He said he wishes to settle the matter in an amicable way and asked for a reply within seven days to confirm they have halted such e-mails.

As of Dec. 1, Catholic Charities did get one automated response from one e-mail, but had not received a reply stating the practice would be discontinued.

Catholic Charities USA is "fully prepared to pursue legal action if the transmission of these fraudulent e-mails does not cease immediately," Pinney said.

FROM THE VATICAN

Without ethics, financial crisis could be a catastrophe, nuncio warns

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — A leading Vatican diplomat warned that the current financial crisis could become a catastrophe unless solutions are found that respect ethics and involve all levels of society.

"It is necessary to recover some basic aspects of finances, such as the primacy of labor over capital, of human relationships over purely financial transactions, and of ethics over the sole criterion of efficiency," Archbishop Celestino Migliore, the Vatican's apostolic nuncio to the United Nations, said Nov. 28. "For some time we've found ourselves in the middle of a financial crisis that could become a catastrophe if its effects are allowed to impact other crises: in economics, food and energy."

Archbishop Migliore made the remarks on the eve of the U.N.-sponsored International Conference on Financing for Development Nov. 29-Dec. 2 in Doha, Qatar. The archbishop led a Vatican delegation to the conference.

He said the Vatican had been involved in planning for the conference, focusing on specific issues such as foreign debt, the mobilization of countries' internal resources, and the need to avoid forms of "economic neo-colonialism."

Archbishop Migliore echoed the Vatican's recent insistence that poor countries have a voice in responding to the financial crisis. He said a multilateral consensus on global economic issues cannot be "subordinated to the decisions of a few."

Archbishop Migliore said the current crisis calls for respect for ethical and legal norms. "Regulations and ethical codes existed well before the crisis. The problem is that great impunity was given to those who didn't respect them," he said.

He said it's also a question of leadership by moral and civil authorities at all levels, who have the duty to respect their citizens.

Vatican makes clear its opposition to U.N. homosexuality declaration

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — The Vatican has made clear its opposition to the United Nations endorsing a universal declaration to decriminalize homosexuality.

Archbishop Celestino Migliore, the Vatican's apostolic nuncio to the United Nations, and Vatican spokesman Jesuit Father Federico Lombardi said unjust forms of discrimination against homosexuals must be avoided.

However, the Vatican does not approve of a formal declaration with political weight that might be used to put pressure on or discriminate against countries that do not recognize same-sex marriage, they said.

A draft declaration, drawn up by France and endorsed by the European Union, was to be presented to the U.N. General Assembly Dec. 10. It condemns discrimination based on sexual orientation and gender identity.

Archbishop Migliore said Dec. 1 that adding these "new categories (to be) protected from discrimination" would create in turn "new and inflexible (forms of) discrimination." For example, he said, "states that do not recognize same-sex unions as 'marriage' will be pilloried and put under pressure" to do so.

Almost 80 countries have laws prohibiting homosexual activity and several nations include the death penalty as a form of punishment for such activity. The church supports fundamental human rights and opposes every form of "unjust discrimination" that includes "not just the death penalty, but all violent or discriminatory criminal laws against homosexuals," Father Lombardi said.

Father Lombardi said the problem with the draft proposal is that it does not just ask for the decriminalization of homosexuality, and it also includes a declaration that might put pressure on or discriminate against communities that uphold marriage as only being between a man and a woman.

Under such a declaration, nations or communities that "do not put every sexual orientation on exactly the same level can be considered contrary to the respect of human rights," he said.

It is no wonder then, he said, that fewer than 50 U.N. member states have endorsed the draft declaration and more than 150 have not signed on.

"The Vatican is not alone" in its opposition to the proposal, he said.

Vatican confirms tentative plans for papal visit to Holy Land in 2009

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — The Vatican has confirmed tentative plans for Pope Benedict XVI to visit the Holy Land in 2009. Israeli sources said the most likely time for the visit would be in May, with stops in Israel and the Palestinian territories.

The pope was invited to visit Israel by Israeli President Shimon Peres in 2007. At that time, the pope made it clear he hoped to make the trip, but Vatican diplomats said the timing would depend in large part on efforts to calm the simmering Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

In recent months, Israeli and Vatican officials began making more concrete plans for a papal visit.

The Vatican spokesman, Jesuit Father Federico Lombardi, confirmed that "diplomatic contacts are under way to study the possibility of a papal trip to the Holy Land during the course of next year." He gave no dates or details.

Father Lombardi declined to speculate on whether the papal visit would include a stop at the Yad Vashem Holocaust Memorial in Jerusalem. The Vatican has urged officials to remove from a permanent display a photo caption stating that Pope Pius XII did nothing to condemn the Nazis and their slaughter of the Jews.

Pope Benedict has another scheduled foreign trip on his calendar for 2009, a visit to Cameroon and Angola in March.

Holy Angels employee receives national award

BELMONT — An employee of Holy Angels in Belmont is the winner of a national health care award.

Fannie Rendleman, a Holy Angels health care technician, is a 2008 recipient of the Irwin Siegel Agency's Direct Support Professionals Recognition Award.

The award, given annually to three winners, is presented to direct support professionals who demonstrate excellence, creativity and commitment to assisting and enhancing the lives of individuals with disabilities.

Award winners receive $500, a commemorative certificate and mention in various state and national ads and other resources throughout 2009.

Rendleman has worked at Holy Angels for 24 years, during which time she also has been a recipient of the Holy Angels president's Award for Excellence and the North Carolina Association of Residential Resources Dr. Ann F. Wolfe Award.

Holy Angels was founded in 1956 by the Sisters of Mercy. The nonprofit corporation provides residential services and programs for children and adults with varying degrees of mental retardation and physical disabilities, some of whom are medically fragile.

the people who have been asking for it," said Msgr. Bellow.

The opening of the Catholic section at Northlake Memorial Gardens is a collaborative effort between the cemetery and St. Mark Church.

It is the second Catholic section to be opened at an independently-owned cemetery in the diocese in the last four months. The Garden of St. Matthew at Forest Lawn Cemetery in Matthews opened Aug. 12.

Plans are currently in the works for the opening of a Catholic section at Sharon Memorial Park and Crematory in Charlotte early next year.

In 2006, the Diocese of Charlotte implemented a moratorium on constructing and expanding columbaria and conducted a study on the use of columbaria and cemeteries.

"The Catholic section at Northlake Memorial Gardens is a pastorally sensitive approach, offering equal access at one location to all our Catholic parishioners who desire a resting place for either the body or for cremated remains," said Bishop Jugis.

"It fulfills the requirements of our policy on cemeteries adopted in 2007, which requires that a resting place for the bodies of the deceased and a resting place for cremated remains be available all at one location," he said.

"There has been a lot of desire for Catholic cemeteries among Catholics coming into this diocese," said Msgr. Bellow.

The development of the Catholic section at Northlake Memorial Gardens is meant to fulfill that desire, not only for parishioners of St. Mark Church and Catholics in the Huntersville area, but for any Catholic who wishes to be buried there, he said.

The cemetery was established in 1985 as Mecklenburg Memorial Park. New owners took over in 1995 and in 2005 the name was changed to Northlake Memorial Gardens. The cemetery consists of 30 acres of land, 10 of which are now in use.

The Catholic section will consist of two gardens — The Garden of the Holy Rosary and The Garden of All Saints — and an area for columbaria. The Garden of the Holy Rosary will have space for approximately 900 flat bronze memorials and The Garden of All Saints will have room for approximately 600 upright monuments. Columbaria will be built in phases as needed. The first one will contain 48 spaces.

"We have been hearing for a number of years that Catholic families would like a Catholic section," said Dana Elder, owner of Northlake Memorial Gardens.

"We're thankful that we have the opportunity to fill the need," he said.

Rodger Porubsky, a parishioner of St. Mark Church, has already purchased burial plots for himself, his wife and their son.

"We weren't looking for a plot at this particular time," said Porubsky, but when he heard about the Catholic section, he thought now is "as good a time as any."

"Now is the time to plan," he said.

Father Hoare attributes the appeal of Catholic cemeteries to a sense of community.

"There is a sense of comfort," he said. "The community of faith begins in this life and continues in eternal life."

BURIAL or CREMATION?

The Order of Christian Funerals, the Vatican-approved rite used for celebrating Catholic funerals, indicates three reasons for the preference of burial of the body of the deceased over the cremation of the body:

— Jesus himself willed to be buried;

— the body at the funeral rite expresses in a natural way the manner people had been accustomed to relating to the person while he or she was living, namely through a human body;

— the body at the funeral rite expresses Jesus' teaching regarding the supernatural dignity and destiny of the human body.

The Order of Christian Funerals presents cremation as an exception to burial and allows Catholics to be cremated "when extraordinary circumstances make the cremation of a body the only feasible choice."

In March 2007, the Diocese of Charlotte issued its new policy on cemeteries and columbaria, which states parishes may offer at one location a resting place for both the bodies and the cremated remains of the deceased.

The policy gives the diocese the option to create Catholic sections in local cemeteries and to receive or purchase land for the establishment of a Catholic cemetery.

Holy smoke

COURTESY PHOTO

Smoke is visible as fourth-grader Joshua Helton and eighth-grader Daniel Nellie light the first candles of each class' Advent wreath during a school-wide Advent celebration at St. Michael School in Gastonia Dec. 2. Students and staff gathered in the cafeteria for the celebration, which included a Bible reading, prayer and song. Principal Joseph Puceta explained the meaning of Advent, the season that opens the church's liturgical year, which begins with the liturgical observance of the fourth Sunday before Christmas and ends when the liturgical observance of Christmas begins.

The Advent wreath is a circle of evergreens with four candles — three purple and one pink — which represent the period of waiting during the four Sundays of Advent for the birth of Christ. Each week a new candle is lit and prayers are said.

Pope begins Advent by asking Christians to be signs of hope

The pope's homily at the evening prayer service in St. Peter's Basilica, the morning Mass he celebrated Nov. 30 at Rome's Basilica of St. Lawrence Outside the Walls and his midday Angelus address at the Vatican afterward all focused on Advent as a time to remember that Christ became human, died for our sins, rose from the dead and will return at the end of time.

Advent hope, he said during the evening prayer service, is a recognition of the ongoing need for salvation.

"We do not await the Lord as some beautiful decoration for a world already saved," he said, but as the only one who can bring to completion the work begun with his incarnation, death and resurrection.

In his Angelus address, the pope said

Advent is a time when Christians prepare to celebrate the birth of Christ by making sure they welcome him fully into their hearts and lives.

But, he said, it also is a time for Christians to set their sights on the end of time and to reform their lives in a way that shows they are ready for the Last Judgment.

"This requires a correct detachment from earthly goods, sincere repentance for one's errors, concrete acts of charity and, especially, humbly and trustingly placing oneself in the hands of God, our tender and merciful father," the pope said.

Visiting the parish community at the Basilica of St. Lawrence Outside the Walls, the pope said the Gospel of the first Sunday of Advent urges believers to be watchful and stay awake.

"To watch means to follow the Lord, to choose that which he has chosen, to love that which he loves, to conform one's life to his," the pope said.

Raising hope for Christmas

Teacher Patti Eiffe and members of her fourth-grade class at St. Leo the Great School in Winston-Salem prepare for their annual class bake sale Nov. 20.

The bake sale raised $535, which the students then used on a class shopping field trip to purchase clothes and toys for Christmas outreach clients of Catholic Social Services' Piedmont Triad Regional Office in Winston-Salem.

In addition to helping others, the class used the experience as a lesson in mathematics — counting money, making change and using the profits to shop for needed items.

Vatican official says Galileo had 'deep religious convictions' the secretary of state, spoke briefly Nov. 26 at the opening of a Rome conference titled, "Science 400 years after Galileo Galilei," designed to bring scientists, ethicists and other experts together to discuss the role of ethics in scientific research.

The cardinal said recent studies and the Vatican's own review of the Inquisition trial of Galileo "have shed light on the shortcomings of churchmen tied to the mentality of their age," but also gave people a more accurate understanding of Galileo's beliefs.

"Galileo, a man of science, also cultivated with love his faith and his deep religious convictions," Cardinal Bertone said, repeating Pope Benedict XVI's statement that "Galileo Galilei was a man of faith who saw nature as a book written by God."

In 1992, Pope John Paul said the church had erred in condemning Galileo for asserting that the Earth revolved around the sun.

After being found guilty of "vehement suspicion of heresy" by the Roman Inquisition at the age of 69, Galileo spent his remaining eight years under house arrest.

The United Nations has proclaimed 2009 the International Year of Astronomy to mark the 400th anniversary of Galileo's use of a telescope to

Galileo Galilei

Born in Pisa in 1564, Galileo was one of the most important mathematicians, physicists, astronomers and inventors of his era.

Through his telescopic observations he discovered sunspots, the moon's pocked and mountainous surface and Jupiter's satellites.

He also provided evidence for Copernicus' view that Earth revolved around the sun. At the time, the generally held theological view was based on several Old Testament verses and attested the sun revolved around a stationary Earth.

This view of the Earth-sun relationship was considered an essential part of the overall belief that humans, as redeemed by Christ, are the center of the universe.

Galileo argued his controversial heliocentric view did not oppose faith.

He believed the Bible was not meant to give scientific explanations of nature; in a letter he once paraphrased a famous remark by Italian Cardinal Caesar Baronius saying sacred Scripture does not reveal what is in the heavens, but rather how to get to heaven.

observe the cosmos.

In addition to publishing the text of Cardinal Bertone's remarks Nov. 26, the Vatican newspaper ran an article titled "Thank you, Galileo" on its front page.

Written by Jesuit Father Jose Funes, director of the Vatican Observatory, the article expressed several hopes for the Galileo anniversary year: that it would encourage people to consider seriously the relationship between faith and science; lead scientists to recognize the role faith played in Galileo's life; and lead theologians to recognize the contributions Galileo made to the church's attitude toward science.

"I think the Galileo case will never be closed in a way satisfactory to everyone," Father Funes wrote in L'Osservatore Romano.

"The dramatic clash of some churchmen with Galileo has left wounds that are still open," he said.

Still, he said, when errors and misunderstandings are confronted, they can lead to clarification and a deeper level of understanding.

"In that sense, I hope that what was — and perhaps still is — an area of conflict can become the ground for an encounter and dialogue," Father Funes wrote.

Archbishop Gianfranco Ravasi, president of the Pontifical Council for Culture, told reporters Nov. 25 that he hoped to find a scholarly institution willing to publish a critical edition of all of the documentation related to Galileo's trial.

Although he was placed under house arrest, "Galileo was never condemned" officially, the archbishop said.

"The pope did not sign the condemnation because the cardinals could not agree," he said.

Vatican wins award for creating rooftop solar-power generator

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — The Vatican won the 2008 Euro Solar Prize for turning the football field-sized roof of its Paul VI audience hall into a giant solar-power generator.

A European association promoting renewable energy presented the award to Cardinal Giovanni Lajolo, president of the commission governing Vatican territory, during the inauguration of the new roof Nov. 26.

Cardinal Lajolo said he would make sure the award, a small silver and glass globe, would go to Pope Benedict XVI, who repeatedly has called on humanity to show greater care for creation.

The association's president, Hermann Scheer, said he hoped more governments, businesses and individuals would be inspired by the Vatican's efforts and thereby promote and support renewable energy, too.

A German company, SolarWorld, donated and installed 2,400 solar panels on the top of the Vatican's audience hall after Vatican officials had made public their plans to convert the rooftop into a solar-power generator.

The gift is estimated to be worth about $1.55 million dollars.

Scheer said the only way to inspire more people to tap into solar power was for a well-respected, "worldwide institution, indeed, the Catholic Church with its global importance," to set the stage and show it could be done.

He said he hopes the Vatican's new solar-panel roof, which will produce some 300,000 kilowatt-hours of power each year, will help "overcome the mental block many people have toward new sources of energy."

general audience.

A large electronic tally board hangs in the hall to keep count of how many kilowatt hours are being produced and how much oil and carbon dioxide is being saved by using solar energy.

After just a few hours on a partly sunny Nov. 26, 60 kilowatt-hours had been generated and 88 pounds of carbon dioxide emissions, or CO₂, were avoided.

Pier Carlo Cusianna, director of technical services for Vatican City, told reporters another solar-panel system was being installed above the Vatican's employee cafeteria to help provide power for heating and cooling the building.

Another project still in the planning stages, he told reporters at the inauguration, is to set up 1.2 acres of solar panels at Vatican Radio's Santa Maria di Galeria transmission center in the countryside outside Rome.

He said they already have a list of potential donors for supplying the solar panels for this and other future projects.

The Vatican has said its aim is to use renewable energy sources for 20 percent of its energy needs by 2020, the target date set by the European Union for its members.

VICTIMS OF VIOLENCE

Nigerians displaced by violence seek refuge at a displacement center in Jos, Nigeria, Nov. 30. Rival ethnic and religious mobs burned homes, shops, mosques and churches in Jos during fighting triggered by a disputed local election. At least 200 were killed.

Nigerian violence mainly political, not religious, archbishop says

Despite sporadic violence, Christian-Muslim relations good, he says

BY JOHN THAVIS
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

VATICAN CITY — The outbreak of violence that left at least 200 people dead in central Nigeria was primarily political, not religious, a Nigerian archbishop said.

Nigerian troops were sent to patrol the city of Jos in late November after roving mobs rioted, burned churches and mosques, and attacked people with gunfire and machetes.

It was feared that the final death toll would be much higher.

Pope Benedict XVI condemned the violence and prayed for the victims at his Sunday blessing Nov. 30.

Archbishop John Olorunfemi Onaiyekan of Abuja, Nigeria, told Vatican Radio the same day that, although news reports have spoken of a clash between Christian and Muslim gangs, the reality is much more complex.

"It is a political problem. Politicians in Nigeria, however, when it suits them, try to exploit religion in support of their ways of doing things," said the archbishop, who was in Rome for church meetings.

In this case, he said, the likely trigger was an electoral conflict between Nigeria's two main parties, the All Nigerian Peoples Party, which is perceived as predominantly Muslim, and the Christian-backed People's Democratic Party.

Although the political parties are not strictly religious, "local political conflicts at times reflect the religious element of their membership, Archbishop Onaiyekan said.

That is particularly true in Jos, which lies between the predominantly Muslim north of Nigeria and the country's predominantly Christian south.

"When there are political problems, ethnic and social differences are mixed together and then the religious difference is added along the same lines," he said.

"It is difficult to identify an exact cause. But I think the primary cause is the control of power and the sense of belonging to one group or the other — who holds control, what are the economic consequences, and so on," he said.

He said that while sporadic violence grabs headlines, Christian-Muslim relations in Nigeria are generally good.

"Quite often the impression is given that in Nigeria people are always killing each other, which is not at all true," he said.

For the most part, he said, Nigerian Christians and Muslims live and work side by side without problems.

Archbishop Onaiyekan is co-president of Nigeria's national interreligious dialogue council. After the recent violence, he said, he spoke with the Muslim co-president of the council to discuss what could be done to calm the situation in Jos.

In a statement issued Nov. 30, he called on the government to conduct a thorough investigation of the violence and to "fish out the real and often faceless planners, promoters and sponsors of these incidents and hold them accountable, no matter who they may be."

He also warned "law-abiding Nigerians" against taking "alternative measures for self-defense if they ever feel that they can no longer trust the state to protect them."

"This must never be allowed to happen," he said.

Bishop urges Obama to secure Israeli-Palestinian peace

WASHINGTON (CNS) — The chairman of the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops' Committee on International Justice and Peace has joined other American Christian leaders in calling on President-elect Barack Obama to make lasting Israeli-Palestinian peace a priority during his first year in office.

Bishop Howard J. Hubbard of Albany, N.Y., is among 40 signers of a Dec. 1 letter developed by Churches for Middle East Peace and sent to Obama's transition team.

The letter urges Obama's incoming administration to "provide sustained, high-level diplomatic leadership toward the clear goal" of establishing a viable Palestinian state alongside a secure Israel.

In a statement, Bishop Hubbard said the continuing conflict between Palestinians and Israelis undermines "the social, economic and spiritual fabric of the lives of all persons in the region, including Christians who have lived in the Holy Land since the earliest days of our faith."

"With majorities of both Israelis and Palestinians supporting a durable peace, it is incumbent on their political leaders and our own to do everything possible to help bring about a just peace," Bishop Hubbard said.

The letter said delaying the implementation of a peace accord between Israelis and Palestinians would place additional burdens on the lives of the dwindling Christian community in the region. The religious leaders also said peace would boost U.S. security while leading to improved stability and relationships throughout the Middle East.

"We believe that Jerusalem — home to two peoples and three religions — has the potential to become a powerful symbol of hope and coexistence for people across the region and the world," the letter said.

Signers included Redemptorist Father Thomas Picton, president, Conference of Major Superiors of Men; Franciscan Sister J. Lora Dambroski, president, Leadership Conference of Women Religious; Ken Hackett, president, Catholic Relief Services; and Archbishop Cyril Aphrem Karim, Archdiocese of the Syrian Orthodox Church for the Eastern United States.

A member of the Jewish community prays in a synagogue for those killed by armed militants in Nariman House in Mumbai, India, Dec. 1. Pope Benedict XVI condemned the wave of terrorist attacks in India and led prayers for the nearly 200 people who died and the hundreds injured in the bloodshed.

Mumbai bishop urges Indians to forgive, unite after attacks

MUMBAI, India (CNS)—A Mumbai church leader urged Catholics and people of all religions to forgive and unite after the terrorist attacks in Mumbai.

Auxiliary Bishop Bosco Penha of Mumbai told the Asian church news agency UCA News Nov. 27 that the church condemned “this dastardly act of terrorism.”

All Catholics, he said, should “go on their knees to pray and get involved in building bridges” among people of all religions and “spread peace, harmony and brotherhood in the city.”

Bishop Penha is currently in charge of the archdiocese while Mumbai Cardinal Oswald Gracias recuperates from cancer surgery.

“The unprecedented ferocity of the terror attack” shocked local church leaders, Bishop Penha admitted.

He said he had talked to Cardinal Gracias about the Catholic Church taking more “responsibility” to do “something solid in Mumbai.”

At the Vatican Nov. 30, Pope Benedict XVI condemned the attacks as acts of “cruel and senseless violence” and led prayers for those who died and for the hundreds injured in the bloodshed.

Teams of terrorists trained in Pakistan and armed with assault rifles and grenades attacked 11 locations in Mumbai beginning about 9:30 p.m. Nov. 26.

Most of the sites targeted were in the main tourist and business district; they included the city’s main commuter train station, a hospital and two luxury hotels, where gunmen held dozens of hostages.

By Dec. 1 more than 170 people, including at least nine Islamic gunmen, had been killed.

Some buildings targeted were near the Catholic archbishop’s residence and the Jesuit-run St. Xavier’s College.

An archdiocesan spokesman, Father Anthony Charanghat, who lives at the archbishop’s house, told UCA News he heard gunfire and grenades explode and knew “something terrible was happening.”

He said the attacks began at a popular seafood restaurant where young gunmen moved in cars, opened fire and exploded three grenades, “killing anybody in sight.”

They then proceeded to a busy train station and a cinema. The government imposed a curfew in the area, Father Charanghat reported.

The attacks frightened people of all religions, said Dolphy D’Souza, president of the Bombay Catholic Sabha (council). Bombay is the former name of Mumbai.

“Words don’t come so easily to express anything except that fear is writ large on the face of this city,” he told UCA News.

“The terror attacks have shaken the church in the city,” added Joseph Dias, general secretary of the Mumbai-based Catholic Secular Forum.

The Catholic Church should take a proactive role to broker peace and harmony, Dias told UCA News, saying his group will try to reach out to the bereaved families and expose the terrorists’ machinations to disturb peace in the country.

Michael Pinto, vice chairman of the National Commission for Minorities and a parishioner at the Cathedral of the Holy Name in Mumbai, said the attacks were planned to project India as an unsafe destination and hurt its economy.

suspected Islamic militants assaulted at least 10 targets in a three-day siege that began Nov. 26.

The pope also expressed concern for the clashes between rival ethnic and religious groups in Jos, Nigeria, where at least 200 people were killed Nov. 28-29. Churches and mosques were burned in the rioting.

“The causes and circumstances of these tragic events are different, but there should be a common sense of horror and condemnation for the explosion of such cruel and senseless violence,” the pope told pilgrims from his apartment window overlooking St. Peter’s Square.

“Let us ask the Lord to touch the hearts of those who delude themselves by thinking that this is the way to resolve local or international problems,” he said.

The morning after gunmen attacked the targets in Mumbai, including the luxury Taj Mahal hotel, the pope deplored the brutality of the violence in a telegram sent to Cardinal Oswald Gracias of Mumbai.

The papal telegram appealed “for an end to all acts of terrorism, which gravely offend the human family and severely destabilize the peace and solidarity needed to build a civilization worthy of mankind’s noble vocation to love God and neighbor.”

The Vatican spokesman, Jesuit Father Federico Lombardi, said the well-coordinated attacks were reminiscent of the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist acts against U.S. targets.

In a commentary on Vatican Radio, Father Lombardi said the terrorists had clearly chosen India, a place of tensions and conflicts, as a “critical point at which to try to ignite an even more frightening conflagration, whose consequences are difficult to imagine, given the demographic dimensions of southern Asia and its role in world development.”

In addition to political tensions in the region, he said, India has been troubled by “persistent and perhaps growing fundamentalist currents, not only in the Islamic world but also among Hindus.”

He noted that India’s minority Catholic community had suffered recent discrimination and attacks, just as the country’s Muslim community did several years ago in a wave of anti-Islamic violence.

“It is horrible that in today’s world religion is mixed up with violence. Fundamentalism is one of the most dramatic risks faced by humanity, and it challenges the conscience of every religious person,” the Vatican spokesman said.

In India, Cardinal Gracias immediately expressed the church’s shock and sadness at the terrorist attacks, which he said were an attack upon the entire country.

“The church in India condemns this attack in the strongest possible terms. Innocent and unconnected people have been killed. Very brave police officers have been killed,” the cardinal said in an appeal issued Nov. 27.

He said the Catholic Church in Mumbai was making all its medical services available to the wounded.

“We must fight together as a nation and as a united people to combat the terrorists. We must never give up hope because ultimately hope will prevail,” the cardinal said.

The Indian bishops’ conference, meanwhile, appealed to the government to take all necessary means to “guarantee the safety of citizens, who yearn for peace and calm.”

India’s National Security Guard commandos killed the last group of terrorists — who were trained in Pakistan — when they battled their way into an area of the Taj Mahal hotel Nov. 29. Shortly before that, the commandos had stormed a Jewish center in the city and found six hostages dead.

Among those killed was Rabbi Gavriel Holtzberg, 29, who was born in Israel and moved to New York.

In Pakistan, Shahbaz Bhatti, a Catholic and the head of the All Pakistan Minorities Alliance, told the Rome-based agency AsiaNews that “we strongly condemn this act of barbaric terrorism and share our grief and sorrow with all families who lost their loved ones in this tragedy.”

He called on the governments of India and Pakistan to make a joint effort to ensure peace and security in the region.

Book on Rwandan Marian apparitions released on anniversary

BY REGINA LINSKEY
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

WASHINGTON — Like many stories from Africa, the story of Mary appearing to three young girls in Rwanda “wasn’t told” beyond the continent, said best-selling author Immaculee Ilibagiza.

So Ilibagiza wrote the first English-language book about Mary’s apparitions in the 1980s at an all-girls Catholic high school in the remote Rwandan village of Kibeho, the only Vatican-recognized Marian apparitions in Africa.

“Our Lady of Kibeho” was released Nov. 28, the anniversary of the first apparition in 1981.

Calling “Our Lady of Kibeho” “the most important book I will write,” Ilibagiza told Catholic News Service Nov. 20 that she can remember hearing about the apparitions from her father at the dinner table, a place where her close family gathered nightly to share the stories of the day and talk about religion.

“My dad said, ‘You won’t believe what happened; the Virgin Mary appeared to a girl in Kibeho,’” Ilibagiza recalled.

She said she learned the details of the Marian apparitions from family talk, village chatter and the tape recordings of the visionaries and Kibeho onlookers that the local priest recorded and played to his parish.

But Ilibagiza said she wasn’t exactly thrilled at the time that another girl saw Mary before she did. That year, Ilibagiza’s fourth-grade teacher had told her class the story of Our Lady of Fatima, and the young Ilibagiza made it her mission to become a visionary.

Ilibagiza, her best friend and her best friend’s little brother pretended to be shepherds, just like the Fatima visionaries, and prayed that Mary would appear to them.

Initially, the local Kibeho priest, villagers and even some members of the Ilibagiza family thought the first visionary, Alphonsine Mumureke, was a liar.

“In my heart as a child, I believed it 100 percent,” said Ilibagiza.

Then Mary appeared at the school to Anathalie Mukamazimpaka and another young girl known only as Marie-Claire, who had tormented Alphonsine after the first apparitions. The three visionaries were rigorously tested by medical and church officials.

In 2001, the Vatican recognized the apparitions to the three girls.

Crowds gathered to witness the mysterious rains that would fall unpredictably from clear skies and to hear Mary’s messages to the visionaries from 1981 to 1989.

The visionaries said Mary asked Rwandans to pray, fill their hearts with love, and reject sin and evil deeds. The visions were joyful until one day in 1984 when all the visionaries reported seeing violence, dismembered corpses, and destruction, the book says.

Mary warned that if Rwandans did not renew their hearts and dispel evil, there would be genocide, it says.

Mary also requested that a church and a basilica, which Mary named in the visions as “Seven Sorrows Church” and “Reunion of the Dispersed Basilica,” be built at Kibeho, Ilibagiza told CNS.

During 100 days in 1994-1995, Rwandans from the majority Hutu tribe hacked to death nearly 1 million minority Tutsis and moderate Hutus. Corpses clogged the roadways and littered the countryside. More than 5,000 refugees were shot by soldiers in Kibeho’s church in 1995.

Most of Ilibagiza’s family, including her brothers, mother and father, were murdered during the war. For 91 days, Ilibagiza hid with six other women in a 3-foot-by-4-foot bathroom at a neighbor’s house. Ilibagiza’s best-selling book, “Left to Tell,” was about how she got through those horrific days with prayer.

“Nothing can ever be difficult to endure if you know Our Lady loves you,” she told CNS.

In the months that followed the Rwandan holocaust, the Marian visions were forgotten, the book says. But as time went on, pilgrims gradually returned.

Ilibagiza told CNS she expects 50,000 people to visit Kibeho for the anniversary this year.

When asked if Ilibagiza knew as a young girl that she would become an author, she said such an idea was “a far-away dream.”

“People in my country didn’t write things down”; they told stories, she said.

“Our Lady of Kibeho” is told as a Rwandan would share a story. It’s about her personal memories and an account of the effect the apparitions had on her and her country.

God’s presence is evident in those around us

BY JEFF HENSLEY
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

Jesuit Father Hubert Schiffer led quite a varied life as a priest. But his survival of the 1945 atomic bomb blast at Hiroshima is what brings him to mind in connection with today’s Advent readings.

Having removed most of the glass embedded in his skin by the explosion, he and other surviving members of his religious order went about gathering up orphans, caring for their needs and bringing them to the train station, so they could travel to safety away from the radioactive debris.

Jesus is coming.

Sister Mary Augustine Matzner, a member of the Sisters of St. Mary of Namur, had many stories of her service of others. One involved taking care of a number of infants in an isolated cabin in the Dakotas.

A blizzard hit unexpectedly, and wood for the heating stove ran out. The only way she and her charges were able to survive the extreme cold was to huddle under blankets, the small children snuggled against her body to draw on her warmth. And survive they did.

Jesus is coming.

Another friend, Mary Schad, had a glow of holiness. Her simple, gentle nature was evident to anyone who met her.

Mary would regularly join others to serve food to the homeless in the basement of a Dallas church. One day as she was dishing out cornbread, the line extended much further than the cornbread that remained in the serving tray.

But as long as people came through the line, the meager amount of cornbread lasted.

Jesus is coming.

These are the acts of those who reflect the Isaiah Scripture: “He has sent me to bring glad tidings to the poor, to heal the brokenhearted.... to announce a year of favor from the Lord. ...”

They echo Mary’s proclamation when she says, “He has filled the hungry with good things,” and they reveal the One whom we await in Advent, the One of whom John the Baptist said, “I baptize with water; but there is one among you whom you do not recognize, the one who is coming after me, whose sandal strap I am not worthy to untie.”

We know this to be true because we have seen the fruit of his coming in those who serve him.

Jesus is coming.

Questions:

As we walk through this season of waiting, can you identify people in your own life who have shown you evidence that Jesus has come? What did their revelation of God’s presence teach you?

Scripture to be Illustrated:

“I am ‘the voice of one crying out in the desert, Make straight the way of the Lord’” (John 1:23bc).

Placido Domingo says new CD highlights Pope John Paul humanity

Songs based on late pope's poetry

BY JOHN THAVIS
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

VATICAN CITY — Famed tenor Placido Domingo said his new album of songs based on Pope John Paul II's poetry illustrates the great humanity and wide interests of the late pontiff.

"It's not supposed to be a religious record, but one that illustrates his humanity and his literary and intellectual capacity," Domingo told Vatican Radio Nov. 28.

"I reflected on this a long time, and told myself the world needs to know what John Paul II has written," he said.

The album, titled "Amore Infinito" ("Infinite Love"), features 12 songs in various languages that were inspired by the poetry Pope John Paul wrote before his election as pope in 1978.

The themes include the world of manual labor, young love, war, nature and family relations.

"This was an act of faith and at the same time an artistic endeavor," Domingo said at a Vatican press conference.

He said the album treated the pope's poetic compositions with great respect.

"The album has great meaning to me, and it speaks to anyone who deeply respects a man of rare greatness like John Paul II," he said.

"I am sure he will be a saint soon," Domingo said of the pope, whose sainthood cause is being considered at the Vatican.

Vatican newspaper: Beatles' music better than today's pop songs

BY JOHN THAVIS
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

VATICAN CITY — The Vatican newspaper said the musical compositions of the Beatles were far more creative than the "standardized and stereotyped" pop music of today.

The Beatles' songs have demonstrated "remarkable staying power, becoming a source of inspiration for more than one generation of pop musicians," it said.

The newspaper, L'Osservatore Romano, published a lengthy and laudatory retrospective on the Beatles Nov. 22 to mark the 40th anniversary of the release of the "White Album," the group's groundbreaking double-record set.

"Forty years later, this album remains a type of magical musical anthology: 30 songs you can go through and listen to at will, certain of finding some pearls that even today remain unparalleled," it said.

With rock songs like "Back in the U.S.S.R." and "Helter Skelter," ballads like "Julia" and "Blackbird," and dreamlike pieces like "Dear Prudence," the album represents the "creative summit" of the Beatles' career, it said.

What characterized the "White Album" and the Beatles' best music in general was an inventiveness that stands in stark contrast with popular music today, the newspaper said.

"Record products today seem mostly standardized and stereotyped, far from the creativity of the Beatles," it said.

The modern pop music industry is too willing to sacrifice originality and fantasy in order to satisfy the consumer models it has adopted and promoted, it said.

The newspaper also recalled that the Beatles were recording with rudimentary tools compared to those used by the high-tech recording industry today. Even so, "a listening experience like that offered by the Beatles is truly rare," it said.

As for John Lennon's famous quip in 1966 that the Beatles were more famous than Jesus Christ, the Vatican newspaper dismissed it as youthful bragging.

"The phrase that provoked profound indignation, especially in the United States, after so many years sounds merely like the boast of a working-class English youth faced with unexpected success," it said.

ARCHIVAL ANECDOTA

For December, here's a look at the apostolic vicars in North Carolina

ARCHIVES PHOTO

Benedictine Abbot-Bishop Leo Haid is pictured outside Belmont Abbey with visiting abbots during the celebration when the abbey was elevated by the pope to abbatial nullius diocesis (abbey of no diocese) status in 1910.

On Dec. 9, 1887, Benedictine Abbot Leo Haid of Belmont Abbey was chosen to be the last vicar apostolic of North Carolina.

An apostolic vicariate is a mission territory that is not yet ready to be established as a diocese. The pope appoints a vicar apostolic to serve and govern this territory in the pope's name.

A vicar apostolic also may receive a titular bishop title (all bishops belong to one of two categories: diocesan or titular). Titular bishops hold a title other than that of diocesan bishops, such as auxiliary bishops, territorial abbots and apostolic vicars. Titular bishops are given titles of some 2,000 ancient Catholic dioceses and archdioceses.

Most titular bishops serve in Asia Minor, North Africa, the Balkans and Greece.

Apostolic Vicariate of North Carolina:

— March 3, 1868: North Carolina is separated from the Diocese of Charleston, S.C., and is canonically established as a vicariate apostolic.

— June 8, 1910: Belmont Abbey is elevated to the status of territorial abbey (abbatia nullius) and eight counties from the Apostolic Vicariate of North Carolina are placed in its jurisdiction: McDowell, Burke, Catawba, Polk, Rutherford, Cleveland, Lincoln and Gaston counties.

— Dec. 12, 1924: The Apostolic Vicariate of North Carolina is elevated to the rank of a diocese and becomes the Diocese of Raleigh, excluding the eight counties listed above.

Apostolic Vicars of North Carolina:

— Bishop James Gibbons: Pope Pius IX appointed Bishop Gibbons as the first vicar apostolic of North Carolina in 1868 (at the age of 33) and as titular bishop of Adramyttium. From 1872 to 1877, Bishop Gibbons served as both vicar apostolic of North Carolina and bishop of Richmond, Va. Bishop Gibbons later became cardinal of the Archdiocese of Baltimore, Md.

— Bishop John J. Keane: He succeeded Bishop Gibbons as both bishop of Richmond and vicar apostolic of North Carolina from August 1878 through 1881. He was named the first rector (president) of Catholic University of America in 1886. In 1900, he was appointed archbishop of Dubuque, Iowa.

— Father Mark Gross: Pope Leo XIII appointed Father Gross vicar apostolic of North Carolina in September 1879. He accepted the appointment humbly but soon renounced his acceptance. Thus, Bishop Keane remained vicar apostolic of North Carolina.

— Bishop Henry P. Northrop: Third vicar apostolic served from 1881 to 1888 and retained this position after being selected bishop of Charleston in 1883.

— Abbot-Bishop Leo Haid: In December 1887, Abbot Haid was appointed as titular bishop of Messene and final vicar apostolic of North Carolina by Pope Leo XIII. His episcopal consecration was July 1888.

(Belmont Abbey was elevated to the status of abbatia nullius diocesis — an abbey of no diocese — in 1910. The Belmont Abbey cathedral is the only one in the United States, and it returned to its original status as Abbey Church of Maryhelp after the abbatia nullius was suppressed Jan. 1, 1977. In 1998, it was named a minor basilica by Rome.)

Abbot-Bishop Haid held three positions: abbot of Belmont Abbey, ordinary of the abbatia nullius and vicar apostolic of North Carolina. After his death, Pope Pius XI promoted the apostolic vicariate to the rank of diocese in 1924. The new Diocese of Raleigh covered the entire state, except the eight county abbatia nullius.

Students get updates, thanks from sister parish counterparts

GREENSBORO — A member of St. Pius X Church's sister parish in Peru recently made a surprise visit to St. Pius X School in Greensboro.

Sister Barbara Philippart, a member of the Sisters of Charity, visited each classroom Nov. 7. She is well known to the students as the "face" of the sister parish, Santiago de Manazo, located in the high Andes mountains.

Sister Philippart relayed messages of gratitude from the students' counterparts in Manazo, where the village children receive education and hot meals from the financial contributions of families and students at St. Pius X Church and School.

For the past 11 years, St. Pius X School students have participated in monthly "no uniform" days by donating a dollar each to dress down. Money raised is sent at the end of the school year to fund Manazo's hot lunch and education programs.

This past year, 50 children and 25 senior citizens received daily hot meals due to the contributions — 12,493 bowls of soup were served for free and 15,182 bowls of soup were subsidized.

Sister Philippart, who lived in Peru for 25 years, now works with a Hispanic community in Michigan but travels regularly to Manazo.

Perspectives

A collection of columns, editorials and viewpoints

Dear Brothers and Sisters in Christ,

Parishes throughout the Diocese of Charlotte will conduct the 21st annual Collection for the Retirement Fund for Religious on the weekend of Dec. 13-14.

Last year this collection, which is conducted by the National Religious Retirement Office of the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops in Washington, D.C., distributed $23 million in grants that benefited 482 of the nation's Catholic religious institutes of women and men.

Since the first national collection took place in Catholic parishes in 1988, the National Religious Retirement Office has raised more than $550 million. Donations have enabled the office to support retirement funds at religious institutes, influence local fundraising and assist with capital campaigns. Grant awards have helped ensure quality of life and adequate health care for thousands of women and men religious who were formerly at risk.

More than 37,000 Catholic religious are now past age 70. More than 4,900 women and men require skilled nursing care, where the average cost in the United States averages more than $55,200 annually. One out of every five religious institutes still has less than 20 percent of the amount needed to care for elderly members.

Almost without exception, our elderly and infirm religious offer moving examples of aging with grace, dignity and faith. Most elderly religious even continue volunteer ministry long after they retire from compensated ministry.

Throughout the history of the Catholic Church there have been those men and women who, called by God, took vows of poverty, chastity and obedience upon entering religious communities. They are the teachers, nurses, counselors and social workers who ministered to others as the hands of Christ in our world today.

On the weekend of Dec. 13-14, Catholics throughout the Diocese of Charlotte will have an opportunity to "Share in the Care" of our retired religious. The Collection for the Retirement Fund for Religious will be taken at all of the Masses on that second weekend in December. I encourage everyone to acknowledge the treasure that our elderly religious represent and respond generously to their retirement needs.

Grateful for your prayers and generosity toward the retired religious throughout the United States, I am

Sincerely yours in Christ,

Msgr. Mauricio W. West

Column captures post-election feelings

I have always enjoyed Father John Catoir's spiritually uplifting columns, but this time I'm inspired to write and thank him for the excellent editorial "Will we become a secular society: Bishops care about deterioration of moral values in society" (Nov. 21).

His summary and carefully worded comments on the final outcome of the interminable election process put everything in better perspective for me. It articulated more clearly why I voted as he did and feel the same way he does regarding the outcome.

The church hierarchy should continue to stand firm in its position regarding the sanctity of life from conception until death, and keep educating its members in Getting the most out of the Mass

Signs and symbols are there to lead us closer to God

Catholicism is often criticized because it is misunderstood by both Catholics and non-Catholics. One of Catholicism's criticized and misunderstood areas is the liturgy.

Through the years, I've heard people say, "I get nothing out of the Mass." Some people have left the church because of this reason. But the solution is simple: If you get nothing out of Mass, it may be because you don't understand it and put nothing into it.

Contrary to popular belief, the Mass' primary purpose is not to entertain you. In fact, the Mass is participatory — you are not to just sit and stare, you are to be an active participant. You are to put something into it, and what you put into it is yourself.

The Catholic religion as a whole, and its liturgy specifically, is full of signs and symbols. This can be a basis for misunderstanding — critics say Catholics worship statues, pray to dead people, go through all kinds of motions and moves.

The signs and symbols of our religion are in fact just reminders of some place, person or thing that had a very specific and blessed relationship with God. When we look at, think about or reenact these signs and symbols, we hopefully will try to emulate their actions and come closer to God.

The church teaches God is infinite and therefore cannot be understood by the finite. So that we, in our humanity, can better understand God, the church expresses his infinity through physical signs and symbols that we can see and understand, believing that through them God can be made manifest to and experienced by us.

But, when we look at and practice these signs and symbols, too many times we do them half-heartedly, routinely and with no knowledge, thought or reflection on what they mean.

If during Mass we were to truly understand and participate, the liturgy would become much more meaningful and fulfilling.

Let us take a brief look at a few of our liturgy's signs and symbols to better understand what they mean.

The baptismal font — a physical reminder of our baptism and our baptismal promises.

The crucifix — unlike Protestant crosses from which Jesus is removed, it is a reminder of what Jesus did and sacrificed for us.

Genuflection — a slow and deliberate action to honor and respect Jesus on the altar.

The Mass' entrance processional — shows that we, as the people of God, are on a journey from this world to eternity with Jesus as our final goal.

The homily — much more than a sermon, which is exaltation and animation, it is a teaching moment.

Penitential rite — an invitation to recall sins and repent in silence, or a series of invocations whereby all confess their trust in the power of Jesus to save them from sin and lead them to heaven.

Profession of Faith — more than a list of things we believe in, it is a bold statement of our belief in Scripture and a profession that our faith and its practice will lead us to give our lives to God and one another — just as Jesus did. We must not just recite it, but listen and reflect.

Eucharistic prayer — a prayer of thanksgiving and sanctification, it is the center and summit of the entire liturgy. The meaning of the prayer is that the entire congregation joins itself to Jesus in acknowledging the great things that God has done. The people offer the sacrifice in both silent reverence and communal acclamations.

Dismissal — a period of silence before the end of Mass. We prepare to return to the world unburdened, healed, strengthened, renewed and fortified by the entire liturgy, and by having received Jesus in word and Eucharist.

Recessional — Having received Jesus at Mass, we take him out into the world.

We cannot take Jesus with us, or appreciate our Catholic faith, if we are not participatory at Mass. Our participation includes giving ourselves totally to God in mind, heart and spirit — to praise, thank, petition, glorify and profess him.

We must know that at every liturgy Jesus and the Holy Spirit are present. We must know they will come to us if we are open to receiving them. And if we give ourselves, they will give themselves. If we don't, they won't.

Are you getting something out of Mass?

I hear you, God

Confession pardons us of sins, gives ability to resist them in future

"God, the Father of mercies, through the death and resurrection of his Son, has reconciled the world to himself and sent the Holy Spirit among us for the forgiveness of sins ..."

When I first heard this prayer 12 years ago, after being away from the Catholic Church since high school, I didn't pay much attention to the words. Today, however, every time I go to confession (now known as the sacrament of reconciliation) and hear the Prayer of Absolution, the voice of God's mercy truly speaks to my heart.

The only words that can surpass his truly miraculous prayer are: "This is my Body, which will be given up for you." Appropriately, the best way to be well-disposed to receive the infinite graces the Eucharist offers is to go to confession frequently.

The first two weeks of Advent concentrate on the Second Coming of Christ and have a penitential dimension. This is why we usually have penance services throughout the diocese during this time.

A great way to prepare for Christ's Second Coming and to receive the Christ Child in our homes and hearts during Christmas is to first receive God's mercy through the sacrament of reconciliation. For not only do we receive pardon for our sins during this sacrament, but we also are given the graces to resist those sins in the future.

The church encourages the faithful to go to confession no less than once a year. But in today's turbulent times — especially with the constant media bombardment of insidious attacks on sexual morals and values — is once a year enough to remain strong in the Lord and faithful to his teachings?

Pope John Paul II said that if a person went to confession at least once a month, he or she would become a saint. The late pope went to reconciliation daily. Arguably, he is one of the greatest popes of modern times and most likely will be proclaimed a saint.

As such, if we are serious in our pursuit of holiness, why not make monthly confession an essential part of our spiritual lives?

Through the sacraments God communicates his grace in tangible and clear forms. We use water for baptism; bread and wine for holy Communion and the Precious Blood of Christ; oil for the anointing of the sick and confirmation. Even in matrimony, we use wedding bands as symbols of the vows. God wants us to see, touch, smell and even taste his presence in them.

Reconciliation is the only sacrament in which the only outward sign is hearing God's grace and forgiveness communicated to us through a priest.

Some critics feel they don't have to confess to a priest, but only to God. But God, in the person of Jesus Christ, appointed his disciples and their successors to forgive sins and bind and loose, on earth as it is in Heaven (Jn 20:22-23).

What could be more beautiful than to hear God tell us through the priest "I forgive you, go in peace and sin no more?"

If you want God's forgiveness for any sin with which you are struggling, go to confession and listen with your heart to that beautiful absolution prayer. "In the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit ..."

Amen.

Christ's redemptive power is stronger than evil, pope says

The Pope Speaks

POPE BENEDICT XVI

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Evil and sin are not irremediable facts of human nature; they can be overcome with the redemptive power of Christ, Pope Benedict XVI said.

The evil in human hearts has developed into "a filthy river that poisons the landscape of human history," the pope said Dec. 3 at his weekly general audience. But through Christ's presence, God has given the world the power to heal because Christ's "river of light" is stronger than this stream of evil, he said.

With an estimated 7,000 people gathered inside the Paul VI hall, Pope Benedict continued his audience talks about the life and teaching of St. Paul, focusing on the meaning of original sin and how the church explains the presence of evil in the world.

Original sin is real and felt by every human being, every day, but this evil is not a normal part of human nature, he said.

Evil does not come from God, he said. "Evil comes from a freedom (that was) created, a freedom abused" by Adam, the pope said.

Lives in the balance

Our world still sees some people not as gifts but as burdens

In mid-November, the news from Italy looked bleak for a 37-year-old woman named Eluana Englaro.

News reports stated that Eluana's elderly father had been fighting in court for 17 years to let her starve to death. And on Nov. 13, Italy's highest court awarded him that false "right."

It seemed the case was closed.

Eluana's father had conquered the court system, but would he conquer a dedicated group of women religious? The Nuns of the Misericordine Order have been lovingly caring for his daughter for the past 14 years, and when the court caved in, they stepped up.

In their appeal to continue to care for Eluana they stated:

"If there is someone who considers her dead, let them leave her to continue with us, who feel she is alive. Let us have the freedom to love and give ourselves to one who is weak.

"Our hope, and that of many like us, is that the death by hunger and thirst of Eluana, and others in her condition, will not be carried out."

The courage and tenacity of these women religious was inspiring. Bishops and cardinals, lay persons and organizations, and doctors and politicians began to speak out. It created a local "culture of life" that is making it quite challenging for Eluana's father to find another facility willing to starve his daughter to death — the same long and tortured death that Terri Schiavo endured four years ago in the United States.

A car accident 16 years ago left Eluana in what some call a "vegetative state." She is not terminally ill. Like each of us, she is a person of immeasurable worth and dignity.

All Eluana needs physically is basic care, including the food and water that each of us takes for granted every day. And there is no doubt that the heroic nuns who now stand by her side are giving her the most loving care possible.

Patients, or their proxies empowered to speak for them, have a moral right to reject extraordinary treatments that are too burdensome for the patient. But no one has a right to deprive them of basic care.

Time and again, the Catholic Church has reminded us that providing warmth, hygiene, food, water and basic comfort are normally required forms of care, not extraordinary medical treatments. We can reject medical treatments as too burdensome, but we must never reject life itself because we see a human life as burdensome.

Let us pray hard for Eluana and the many others like her. May our world see her as the gift that the nuns so clearly recognize, and not as a burden.

Pray too, for the successful campaign by the Nuns of the Misericordine Order, and all those whom they have inspired. We must halt society's descent into a culture where death is seen as the solution to medical, social and economic problems.

Lives hang in the balance.

Here is the text of the pope's audience remarks in English.

Dear Brothers and Sisters,

In our continuing catechesis on St. Paul, we now consider the Apostle's teaching on the relation between Adam, the first man, and Christ, the second Adam (cf. 1 Cor 15:22.45; Rom 5:12-21).

Paul's teaching on the sin of Adam and its disastrous consequences for the human family is meant to emphasize the surpassing gift of grace bestowed on humanity by Jesus Christ.

Seen in this light, the doctrine of original sin explains the misery of our human condition, yet Paul also underlines the moral responsibility of each man and woman for this tragic reality.

"All have sinned," the Apostle tells us, "and all fall short of the glory of God" (Rom 3:23).

Yet now, by faith in Christ, we have been justified and are at peace with God (cf. Rom 5:1). Christ, the new Adam, by his obedience to the Father's will, has set mankind free from the ancient burden of sin and death.

In baptism, he has given us a share in his saving death and resurrection, and made us adoptive children of the Father.

The new life and freedom, which we have received by the grace of Christ, impels us to bear witness to the sure hope that all creation will be freed from its bondage to corruption, and share in the glorious freedom of the children of God (cf. Rom 8:19ff.).

Members of the Knights of Columbus arrive at a rally in support of Proposition 8 at a football stadium in San Diego Nov. 1. Californians approved Proposition 8, defining marriage as only between a man and a woman, overturning a recent California court decision legalizing gay marriage.

Archbishop asks for tolerance of views in same-sex marriage debate

BY DAN MORRIS-YOUNG
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

SAN FRANCISCO — San Francisco's archbishop has appealed to people on both sides of the same-sex marriage issue to be tolerant of each other, to "disagree without being disagreeable" and not presume to know "the real motives" behind people's viewpoint.

"We need to stop hurling names like 'bigot' and 'pervert' at each other. And we need to stop it now," Archbishop George H. Niederauer said Dec. 1 in an open letter.

Voters in the state Nov. 4 passed a ballot initiative called Proposition 8, which is a constitutional amendment to define marriage as "valid and recognized" only if between a man and a woman.

Since Election Day there have been vigorous protests against the outcome in California and around the country by gay rights supporters.

Some of the demonstrations have targeted churches and in particular Mormon temples, because the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints was a major funder of a campaign supporting the measure.

The Catholic Church and other denominations also supported it.

On Nov. 19 the California Supreme Court agreed to decide constitutional issues stemming from voters' approval of the initiative but has denied requests to suspend enforcement of the initiative until the questions are resolved.

In his open letter, posted on the Archdiocese of San Francisco's Web site, www.sfarchdiocese.org, the archbishop said people "need to stop talking as if we are experts on the real motives of people with whom we have never even spoken."

He said that "tolerance, respect and trust are always two-way streets" and called on "churchgoers" to "speak and act out on the truth that all people are God's children and are unconditionally loved by God."

"Whoever they are, and whatever their circumstances, their spiritual and pastoral rights should be respected, together with their membership in the church," the archbishop wrote.

"In that spirit, with God's grace and much prayer, perhaps we can all move forward together," he wrote.

Agree to disagree

In the letter, the archbishop also:

— Stated that the Archdiocese of San Francisco "did not donate or transfer any archdiocesan funds" to support Proposition 8.

— Strongly criticized "voices in the wider community" which charged Proposition 8 backers with "hatred, prejudice and bigotry."

— Defended faith communities' involvement in the political arena.

— Underscored Proposition 8 backers' "defense of the traditional understanding and definition of marriage" as their motivation, rather than seeking to attack "any group" or "to deprive others of their civil rights."

Apparently responding to media claims that he had called on contacts within the Mormon church from his 11 years as bishop of Salt Lake City for help in the Proposition 8 campaign, the archbishop wrote, "I did write to them and they urged the members of their church, especially those in California, to become involved."

Mormon financial backing of Proposition 8 has been reported at $22 million of the roughly $35 million raised to promote the constitutional amendment. Total spending for both sides of the campaign surpassed $75 million; it is said to be the costliest initiative campaign in U.S. history.

"It is important to point out here that a wide range of churches became active in favor of Proposition 8 in addition to Catholics and LDS members," Archbishop Niederauer said.

"Even though we supporters of Proposition 8 did not intend to hurt or offend our opponents, still many of them, especially in the gay community, feel hurt and offended," the archbishop wrote, and then asked, "What is to be done?"

He continued, "Tolerance, respect and trust are always two-way streets, and tolerance respect and trust often do not include agreement, or even approval. We need to be able to disagree without being disagreeable."

"We need to stop talking as if we are experts on the real motives of people with whom we have never even spoken. We need to stop hurling names like 'bigot' and 'pervert' at each other. And we need to stop it now," he said.

Under the law

In issuing its order on Proposition 8, the California Supreme Court directed supporters and opponents of the initiative to submit written arguments or three questions:

— Is it invalid because it constitutes a revision of, rather than an amendment to, the California Constitution?

— Does it violate the separation-of-powers doctrine under the California Constitution?

— If it is not unconstitutional, what is its effect, if any, on the marriages of same-sex couples performed before the adoption of Proposition 8?

The court issued its order in three cases protesting Proposition 8 as an unconstitutional override of the high court's ruling in May that same-sex couples have a right to designate their unions as marriage.

The parties in the cases include same-sex couples and a number of cities and counties that want to issue marriage licenses under the ruling. They claim the measure denies same-sex couples equal treatment under the law.

CHARLOTTE — Enrollment in undergraduate college programs at Catholic seminaries in the United States is the highest it has been since the 2001-02 school year, according to a study by the Center for Applied Research in the Apostolate at Georgetown University in Washington, D.C.

Despite the increase, this year's enrollment of 1,381 college seminarians is only 11 percent of the number reported by CARA's first survey in 1967-68.

In the Diocese of Charlotte, one parish is making an effort to support and promote vocation awareness with a new prayer ministry.

ACTIVE AMBASSADOR

Pope Benedict XVI receives credentials from Mary Ann Glendon, the U.S. ambassador to the Vatican, during a private meeting at the Vatican Feb. 29. When she leaves her post Jan. 19, 2009, it will end a term that was the briefest on record, yet one of the most active.

Point of pride: Glendon glad to have served as Vatican ambassador

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — When Mary Ann Glendon leaves her post as U.S. ambassador to the Vatican Jan. 19, 2009, she'll end a term that was the briefest on record, yet one of the most active.

Since her arrival in Rome last February, Glendon has been kept busy with a trip by Pope Benedict XVI to the United States in April, a return visit to the Vatican by President George W. Bush in June, five major embassy-sponsored conferences and the daily rounds of diplomatic obligations at one of the world's premier listening posts.

In early December, she was co-hosting a Rome symposium on "Philanthropy and Human Rights," which featured nine expert speakers from around the world.

Like many of the embassy's events, its editorial line largely reflected the Bush administration views on social and economic questions.

Glendon believes the last eight years have seen a convergence of U.S. and Vatican positions in such areas as humanitarian assistance, the role of faith-based institutions, religious freedom and the place of religion in civil society.

"How lucky I've been to have served here at a time when relations between the United States and the Holy See have been so close and productive," she said.

The pope's U.S. trip in April, she said, was particularly interesting to her because the pontiff made a point of praising the American model of religious freedom. Sometimes described as "positive secularism," it's a model that gives religious values a significant voice in the public square, rather than excluding them on the grounds of church-state separation.

It just happens that the American model of religious freedom is also the topic of the U.S. Embassy's last big conference under Glendon, to take place Jan. 13 in the presence of other diplomats accredited to the Holy See and Vatican officials.

Glendon is already excited about the lineup.

"It doesn't get any better than that. It's going to be the grand finale; it's going to be fantastic. Be there or be square," she said.

The January conference marks the 25th anniversary of diplomatic relations between the United States and the Vatican. It is also the last in a series of embassy conferences commemorating the 60th anniversary of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights.

Glendon said she came to the ambassador's position knowing it would be a short stint and decided to set an ambitious agenda based on those two anniversaries, convinced that human rights was an area where U.S. and Vatican interests coincided.

Glendon said one of the best things about being ambassador has been the endless variety of people and events.

"You never know what the day will bring, and the job varies with what's going on in the world," she said.

Glendon will return to her role as law professor at Harvard University in January. She'll be back occasionally at the Vatican, however, as a member of the Pontifical Academy of Social Sciences. She resigned her position as president of the pontifical academy when she became ambassador, and whether she will return as academy president again is "up to the Holy Father," she said.

Christian, Jewish, Muslim leaders write Obama on Middle East peace

WASHINGTON (CNS) — Cardinal Theodore E. McCarrick, Washington's retired archbishop, has joined Christian, Jewish and Muslim religious leaders in calling upon President-elect Barack Obama to take an immediate leadership role in securing peace between Palestinians and Israelis in the violence-torn Middle East.

Writing the incoming president Dec. 4, members of the National Interreligious Leadership Initiative for Peace in the Middle East expressed hope that Obama would follow through on his "clear and consistent commitment" throughout the recently concluded presidential campaign to make peace a high priority early in his administration.

"We believe it is essential that the leaders and people of Israel, the Palestinian territories and Arab states be assured that you intend to implement this priority with a sense of urgency following your inauguration," the leaders said.

Citing gradual but continued progress on a number of fronts, the leaders also are seeking meetings with the new president and Hillary Clinton, Obama's nominee as secretary of state, to offer their ideas and support for U.S. efforts in the region.

"Our nation and the world will be much safer with the achievement of peace in Jerusalem," the letter said.

The letter to Obama came on the heels of a Nov. 21 consensus statement from the initiative, which reiterated the group's call for a two-state solution and the need to act immediately to secure an agreement between Israelis and Palestinians. Titled "A Window of Hope for the Peace of Jerusalem," the statement acknowledged that setbacks have slowed peace efforts but said work toward peace cannot succumb to cynicism.

Cardinal Francis E. George of Chicago, president of the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops, and Cardinal McCarrick were among the interreligious leaders whose names appeared on the Nov. 21 statement.

Vatican signs, ratifies convention banning cluster bombs

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — The Vatican has signed and ratified a new treaty to end the production and use of cluster bombs, and appealed to the international community to ban "this inhumane type of weapon."

Archbishop Dominique Mamberti, Vatican secretary for relations with states, was one of more than 100 diplomats who signed the Convention on Cluster Munitions in Oslo, Norway, Dec. 3.

In a speech during the signing ceremony, the archbishop said the Vatican chose to sign and ratify the convention the same day in order to send "a strong political signal" to the rest of the world.

The United States and other major countries that produce cluster weapons — including Russia, China, Israel, India and Pakistan — have not signed the convention.

The United States has expressed concern that a ban would restrict what it sees as the legitimate use of such weapons and has said that cluster bombs were essential to U.S. military operations.

Archbishop Mamberti urged nations who continue to produce, export or use these deadly munitions to heed the numerous civilian victims' call for disarmament and to sign the convention.

Cluster bombs scatter hundreds of submunitions or bomblets over a wide area. Most casualties of these weapons are civilians, and a high percentage of those killed or maimed are children.

The international agreement to ban cluster bombs was first reached May 30 by diplomats from 111 countries. The treaty specifies that participating countries cannot use cluster bombs and requires participants to destroy existing stockpiles within eight years and to clear bombs from old battlefields.

The treaty will take effect in mid-2009.

People need to accept God's invitation, live requirements for salvation, preacher says

VATICANCITY(CNS)—God opens the doors to salvation while humanity has only to accept his invitation, said the preacher of the papal household.

The preacher, Capuchin Father Raniero Cantalamessa, told Pope Benedict XVI and top Vatican officials Dec. 5 that God took the initiative of offering salvation through his son, Jesus Christ.

Individuals "have only to welcome, in faith, God's offer and live out its requirements," he said.

Offering an Advent meditation on St. Paul's conversion, Father Cantalamessa said the gift of salvation is just like a king who opens the doors to his palace, which has been decked out with a huge buffet.

"Standing at the door, he invites every passer-by to come in, saying, 'Come, everything is ready!'"

He said Jesus makes the same appeal in his parable of the wedding banquet, calling on people not to miss the opportunity to enter the kingdom of heaven.

The papal preacher said St. Paul makes a similar point with his teachings on justification.

"Christianity doesn't start out telling people what they have to do, but what God did for them in Jesus Christ. Christianity is the religion of grace" and of receiving God's gifts, he said.

"There is room — and how — for performing one's duties and observing the commandments, but that comes after, as a response" to God's gift of justification, he said.

Doing good works and following God's laws are not the cause or the price to pay to receive salvation, he said.

"He does not save us for doing good works even though he doesn't save us without doing good works," Father Cantalamessa said.

Rather, he said, people who believe are made just in the eyes of a merciful God.

Vatican urges protection of religious freedom, response to trafficking

VATICANCITY(CNS)—A leading Vatican diplomat called for better protection of religious freedom in the face of increasing acts of violence and discrimination against Christians and members of other religions.

Archbishop Dominique Mamberti, the Vatican secretary for relations with states, also urged a more comprehensive response to the problem of human trafficking and its effects on vulnerable groups such as women and children.

Archbishop Mamberti made the remarks Dec. 4 in a speech to representatives of the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe who met in Finland.

He said the adoption of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights 60 years ago was one of the greatest achievements of the United Nations, and noted that the church was working in every country to make sure those rights are not only proclaimed but also put into practice.

One of these fundamental rights is religious freedom, he said.

"The Holy See promotes this right, demands that it be universally respected, and views with concern the increasing episodes of violence, as well as the ongoing acts of discrimination and intolerance against Christians and members of other religions," he said.

Roses and thorns

Pope lays achievements, concerns at feet of Mary

BY CINDY WOODEN
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

ROME — Laying a basket of white roses at the foot of a statue of Mary, Pope Benedict XVI said Catholics can lay everything at the feet of their heavenly mother.

"Symbolically, these roses can express everything beautiful and good that we have done during the year," the pope said during his visit to the center of Rome Dec. 8 for the traditional ceremony alongside the statue of the Immaculate Conception near the Spanish Steps.

"But, as the saying goes, 'Every rose has its thorn,' and the stems of these stupendous white roses are not lacking thorns, which represent the difficulties, sufferings and ills that have marked and still mark the lives of people and of our community," the pope said.

Under brilliantly sunny skies, bundled up against a crisp chill, thousands of Romans and tourists jammed the square around the Spanish Steps to see the pope and pray with him.

Offering the roses to Mary, the pope also entrusted to her his special prayers for children, particularly those who are sick, disadvantaged or suffering because of family problems.

He prayed for elderly people living alone, for the sick, for immigrants struggling to build a new life in a new country, for families who barely make ends meet and especially for people who recently have lost their jobs.

"Mary, teach us to be in solidarity with those who are in difficulty, to bridge the increasingly vast social disparities; help us cultivate a livelier sense of the common good," Pope Benedict prayed.

The pope said the beauty of Mary, conceived without sin, "assures us that the victory of love is possible; in fact, it is certain. It assures us that grace is stronger than sin and therefore it is possible to be redeemed from any form of slavery."

The example of Mary's life helps Christians believe in goodness, graciousness, service, nonviolence and the power of truth, he said.

"She encourages us to remain wakeful, not to give in to the temptation of easy escapes, but to face reality with all its problems with courage and responsibility," Pope Benedict said.

The pope said that, looking up at Mary, Christians experience the same sensation a child has when looking up at his or her mother "and, seeing her smile, forgets every fear and pain."

"Turning our gaze to Mary, we recognize in her the smile of God, the immaculate reflection of divine light, and we find new hope even in the midst of the problems and dramas of our world," Pope Benedict said.

Earlier in the day, the pope recited the Angelus with visitors gathered in St. Peter's Square.

He said the feast of the Immaculate Conception reminds Catholics of two basic church teachings: the existence of original sin and the fact that, through Christ, God has redeemed those who believe.

The pope also noted that Dec. 8 marked the end of the yearlong celebrations of the 150th anniversary of the apparitions of Our Lady of Lourdes, who identified herself to St. Bernadette Soubirous as "the Immaculate Conception."

New ministry promotes prayers for vocations

Cup, the ministry at St. Thomas Aquinas Church in Charlotte encourages families to pray for vocations to the priesthood and religious life.

"I think so many times we complain that there are no vocations. But very rarely do we focus our prayers on that as a parish family," said Capuchin Franciscan Father Remo DiSalvatore, pastor of St. Thomas Aquinas Church.

Father DiSalvatore said he heard about a parish in New Jersey with a similar ministry and thought it would be a good addition to the church.

"With all the young people we have here and the spiritual parish that we have, we should be praying for vocations," he said.

Each Sunday after Mass, a family or an individual from the parish accepts the cup and agrees to pray for vocations to the priesthood and religious life throughout the week.

The family is asked to place the Vocations Blessing Cup in a place of honor in its home and gather around it each day to pray together.

In addition to the prayer for vocations, families are encouraged to pray the rosary together daily.

The Vocations Blessing Cup comes with a packet of materials including additional prayers, information on various religious orders and DVDs on discerning vocations.

There also is a journal that gets passed along with the cup, in which families are encouraged to share their thoughts and experiences with others who will host the cup.

The benefits of the ministry are twofold, according to Father DiSalvatore.

"It brings the family together to pray, which is a powerful thing in itself," he said. And "it creates a deeper awareness, both in parents and children, of the great calling of the priesthood and religious life."

"I am grateful that Father Remo was moved to create this ministry at St. Thomas Aquinas and I'm honored to have been included in the planning," said Cheryl Eckert, finance administrator at the parish.

Eckert's son John is a seminarian for the Diocese of Charlotte at Pontifical College Josephinum in Columbus, Ohio.

"People have asked me, 'What do you do as parents to have a son discern the priesthood?'" said Eckert. "The best thing my husband and I did was pray and stay out of the way and let God do his work. The Vocations Blessing Cup Ministry has been the same way."

Joining Eckert on the planning committee are Michelle McNulty and Gloria Buchanan, also mothers of seminarians for the diocese.

"We just planted the seed and our parish has taken off with it," Eckert said.

The women first got together about eight months ago and began by researching other churches with similar ministries. When they came up with a plan for implementing it at their parish, they spoke at weekend Masses and the idea "spread like wildfire," according to Eckert.

"The calendar got filled in right away," she said.

In June, Bishop Peter J. Jugis blessed the cup while he was at the church for a confirmation ceremony.

Now that it has been underway for several months, the parish is beginning to see the fruits of the ministry.

"It makes our parish stronger as a praying parish," said Father DiSalvatore. "It has been a few months and already I've had one young man come and talk to me about a call to the priesthood."

Delia Clay and her family recently hosted the cup in their home.

Clay felt drawn to participate in the ministry because she "wanted to contribute to the parish mission" and because she knows there is a shortage of priests.

"I am hoping one of my sons may become a priest one day," she said.

For now, she is glad they are being "exposed to what the vocation is all about."

Clay said she hopes to make the prayer time with her family a nightly routine.

"It was really a good feeling," she said, "even though the cup was only with us for a week."

"By doing this, the Holy Spirit will be with us, and hopefully guide my children," she said.

Seeing St. Nick(s)

Eddie Meeks, custodian at St. Gabriel School in Charlotte, is pictured dressed as St. Nicholas Dec. 5. Meeks visited the classrooms to tell the students the story of St. Nicholas of Bari, a fourth century bishop of Myra in Asia Minor and a pastor noted for his charity. St. Nicholas also is the patron saint of children and has been popularized as Santa Claus. Legend says the saint secretly gave gold to poor girls for their dowries, which has given rise to his patronage of children and the giving of gifts in his name at Christmas time.

Keeping with school tradition, each kindergarten and first-grade student left a shoe in the hallway to receive treats from St. Nick.

Advent is a joyful period during which Christians prepare for the commemoration of Christ's birth.

The wreath is a main symbol of the season, with a new candle lit each Sunday before Christmas.

A reminder of the season's reason

Retreat explores Advent, Christmas spirit

CHARLOTTE — Hispanic Catholics in the Charlotte area gathered for an Advent retreat at St. John Neumann Church in Charlotte Nov. 29.

Retreat speakers were Augustinian Father Russell Ortega, pastor of St. John Neumann Church; Deacon Guido Pozo, a permanent deacon at St. Gabriel Church in Charlotte; and Deacon Edwin Rodriguez, a permanent deacon at St. Vincent de Paul Church in Charlotte.

"Their messages powerfully stated how the same world that God so desired to save can often squelch the spirit of Advent that we are called to embrace," said Jorge Gomiz, Hispanic ministry coordinator for the Charlotte Vicariate.

With hectic work and personal schedules and the commercialization of the holidays, "it's easy at times like this to forget what Christmas is really about," said Gomiz.

"The speakers remind us that this is where Advent comes in. Once we understand Advent for what it is truly meant to be, it can be the antidote to the stress that often accompanies the holiday season," he said.

"Advent calls us to refocus our minds back to what is important and to remember again the true reason for the season," he added.

"It is a time to prepare ourselves so that when God wishes to come through us, we, like Mary, will be able to say 'yes' to him," said Gomiz.

Advent Mass honors those with developmental disabilities at parish

CHARLOTTE — The annual SPRED Advent Mass was held at St. Matthew Church in Charlotte Dec. 7.

The parish SPRED (Special Religious Development) program enables those with developmental disabilities to participate in the life of the church.

The Advent Mass, in which SPRED members participate, was to celebrate and acknowledge the importance of those with special needs as vital members of the church and parish family.

Father Patrick Tool, parochial vicar and chaplain for the SPRED program, celebrated the Mass, which was concelebrated by Msgr. John McSweeney, pastor, and Father Patrick Cahill, parochial vicar. Deacon Jim Hamrlik assisted.

Nearly 2,000 people attended the Mass, including members of the Knights of Columbus and members of the United Methodist group homes.

As those with developmental disabilities learn best through ritual, music and movement, sacred movements were performed by a group of robed catechists during the first reading. SPRED participants, with the assistance of catechist-helpers, led the congregation in gestures to the response.

After Mass, Msgr. McSweeney commended the Knights of Columbus for their ongoing support of SPRED through Operation LAMB (Least Among My Brethren) donations. He emphasized also the importance of recognizing the dignity and blessedness of all members of the church.

St. Matthew Church currently has the only SPRED program in the area and serves as a training and observation center for other churches attempting to start a similar program. Currently, two parishes are involved with training.

Volunteers prepare meals to be served and distributed as part of the annual Bounty for Bethlehem Christmas Day dinner at Immaculata School in 2005. More than 3,000 people in Henderson County are expected to attend this year's dinner.

a visit from Santa Claus, as well as meals delivered to homebound residents.

Work begins in September for the team of organizers. Hours of preparation and planning culminate the week before Christmas, when volunteers arrive to begin making the dinners.

"It's almost a yearly pilgrimage," said Randy Hair, Bounty for Bethlehem co-chairman. "There is a spirit with Bounty that makes it feel like a retreat. Not a contemplative retreat — it's too noisy and busy for that — but a hands-on place to make connections."

The hands-on atmosphere extends through the 600 volunteers as well as numerous others who provide time, donations and support to create not only a feast, but also fellowship among those who participate.

"It's the volunteers and generosity of this community that fuels this," said Hair.

The volunteers spend hours working and chatting around pots of string beans, chopping piles of onions and celery for the stuffing, and dishing out portions of cranberry sauce. Everything at the dinner is homemade — mashed potatoes, rolls and an array of desserts round out the menu.

"I don't know what it is about working yourself to death for a week, for one meal," said B.J. Klein, co-chair.

"You leave here exhausted and go home happy as you can be. People who come here are giving from the heart. There's nothing quite like it," said Klein.

Many volunteers return year after year, and last year's dinner saw an increase in teenage volunteers. Hair's son Matt and daughter Bethany have joined him for the last six years working in the kitchen. Matt, now a freshman away at college, will return to help once again.

Additional volunteers will come in handy, as Hair expects at least a 10 percent increase in attendance this year. As the dinner relies on donations, Hair estimates 150 turkeys and 100 hams, among other items, are needed to feed the expected guests. As such, organizers have put out a call for food donations. Drop-off for turkeys and hams is Dec. 19 between 2 and 6 p.m.

"We need cookies early, because they go into the delivered meals," said Sandy Litogot, desserts chairperson. "Cakes and other desserts on the 23rd and 24th, but we need the cookies earlier. We always need a lot of cookies."

The happy faces, and the smiles of children as they receive gifts from Santa, are the reasons volunteers and contributors continue to work hard to make the dinner a success each year.

"It's a gift you give yourself by giving to others," said Hair. "Once it pulls you in, you pull in others and it's here — that spirit, it's here."

Couple say rosary, prayers helped them survive attack

see Mount Everest.

The India leg of the trip concluded with an afternoon reception on the hotel's ground floor for the tourists, many of whom William Stadelmann said stayed downstairs for dinner, while he and his wife returned to their room to pack for their 4 a.m. departure for the airport.

"At the party we were all saying how safe we felt in India," he said Dec. 2.

At or around 10 p.m. there was a loud explosion.

"I thought it was fireworks," he said.

Next, he said, came a call from the hotel security, who told him there were gunmen in the hotel and he should turn off the lights, lock the door and open it for no one. For the next 15 hours, the couple stayed under their bed.

From under the bed, the couple could hear terrorists move down the hallway, pound on each door and use an explosive that sounded like a grenade.

"They would blow the door open and start shooting everyone inside," Stadelmann said.

There was at least one gunman perched high over the atrium firing into the rooms and down upon the people running across the bottom of the atrium to escape the hotel.

With the sniper outside, he said his wife did not want to risk getting up and going to the bag with her rosary beads, so she used her knuckles to keep track, he said.

"Of the 15 hours, my wife was saying the rosary for, I'd say, 14 and a half hours."

Meanwhile, Stadelmann said he used his laptop equipped with an international wireless Internet card to maintain contact with his family back home.

Beyond the explosions and the gunmen going door-to-door, the greatest danger to the couple was the fire, he said.

"There were 1,000 rooms in the hotel, so I figured our chances were pretty good. But, the fire was really something. A fire will find you."

Stadelmann opened the windows just a crack and he put wet towels at the bottom of the doors to block the smoke that was filling the hotel, he said. To breathe, he and his wife covered their noses with wet towels, too.

Because their section of the hotel was constructed of concrete, he said, he was confident the structure was sound, even when the roof of the atrium caught fire and its flaming pieces streamed down past their window.

When help arrived, it was a team of six Indian Army special forces soldiers dressed in black uniforms with black bandanas on their heads, he said.

"They had everything, guns, knives and radios. They were the real deal," he said.

Along the way, the group had to walk past five or six bodies and at each one his wife stopped to make the sign of the cross, he said.

Of the more than 170 killed, one was a man from Australia the couple befriended on the tour.

"The Indian people are wonderful," he said.

Many of the hotel staff risked their lives or were killed trying to help guests get to safety. Their Hindu culture teaches them to be kind and concerned for others.

Stadelmann said those rosaries and the prayers of his friends and family back home were the reason they lived through the ordeal.

"We have a tremendous faith and we were getting prayers from all over the place," he said.

Detroit religious leaders call to save auto industry

"There is great concern for the countless individuals and families who are under great stress because of the uncertainty of our economy," Cardinal Maida said at a media briefing following the meeting.

"They need to hear words of hope and encouragement. This is a time to stand in solidarity with all who are suffering the loss of jobs or homes, and all those who are anxious about what will happen in the future to the automobile industry in metro Detroit," he said.

Cardinal Maida said both business and labor leaders had expressed fear of what could happen if there is no government action.

"The alternative is not only unwise; it is unthinkable. If nothing is done, one can only imagine what would happen to all of us who call this corner of Michigan home," he added.

The 11 religious leaders represented local Catholics, Anglicans, Protestants, Jews and Muslims.

Cardinal Maida said they also had discussed various ways each faith community has been responding to requests for assistance to people in need — a situation exacerbated by the economic crisis — and how they can work together on programs and projects.

"We committed ourselves to keep our lines of communication open between and among our faith communities. When and where we can collaborate, we will," the cardinal said.

Besides bringing together the representatives of the various faith communities, Cardinal Maida also released to the press the text of a pastoral letter on the economy, "Christ Our Hope," to be distributed in all 290 parishes and missions of the archdiocese the weekend of Dec. 6-7.

It was printed in the Dec. 5 issue of The Michigan Catholic, the archdiocesan newspaper.

In it, the cardinal offered hope and encouragement to those suffering hardships, and urged all local Catholics to show charity and solidarity to others in this time of difficulty.

Urging prompt action

The religious leaders' meeting took place as the auto companies' top executives returned to Washington to plead their case before a U.S. Senate panel.

After a meeting with Detroit-area religious leaders, Detroit Cardinal Adam J. Maida speaks during a press conference in Detroit Dec. 4. Cardinal Maida and other leaders representing local Anglicans, Protestants, Jews and Muslims emerged from the meeting to call on Washington lawmakers to provide federal assistance to stabilize the American automobile industry.

and representatives already committed to supporting assistance to Detroit's automakers, the religious leaders pledged to work through their colleagues in other states to convince other lawmakers of the urgency of prompt action.

Bishop Charles Ellis, pastor of Greater Grace Temple in Detroit, pledged to work through his denomination, the Pentecostal Assemblies of the World, which has 2,000 congregations.

Rabbi Daniel Syme, of Temple Beth El in suburban West Bloomfield Township, remarked on the discrepancy in the federal government's treatment of the auto companies — whose employees are mostly blue-collar workers — as opposed to Wall Street firms and their white-collar workforces.

The Rev. Edwin Rowe, pastor of Central United Methodist Church in downtown Detroit, said, "You can beat up the auto company CEOs all you want, but the people who are going to lose their jobs are the people at my door asking for help."

He also suggested white racism might be involved in some lawmakers' reluctance to help the Big Three automakers, as Detroit is perceived as a black city.

Congress was considering various options to help the automakers but no decisions have been reached.

Challenges and opportunities

In his pastoral letter, Cardinal Maida offered "some pastoral insights and suggestions about how we might prepare to celebrate Christmas this year when economic conditions are so grim."

He noted the loss of jobs, homes, pensions and personal investments and the fact that the automobile industry, "our primary employer," is suffering "major challenges."

"While many of us have lived through other times of downsizing and economic downturns, this time, the prospects for recovery require radical changes. Things in Michigan will probably never be the same," he said.

But the cardinal said the people of Michigan, like those around the world, have "tenacity, perseverance and determination," and are "ready to do whatever it takes to survive, even to thrive."

"As believers, we have all the more reason to see these challenging times as an opportunity to be resourceful," Cardinal Maida said.

He reminded everyone the economy is about people, not just money, and that all of them "have a responsibility to one another and that God desires 'we live as his family supporting one another.'"

He included "prayerful reflections" for readers to consider, such as:

— "When I make decisions about economic matters for myself and my family and my co-workers, in what ways do I take into account the larger common good?"

— "How might I show charity to others immediately around me?"

— "Do I believe in the power of prayer and that in many ways prayer is our greatest resource?"

"We all need to receive and we all need to give," he said, adding that there is "no shame" in needing help.

But even when people do not have "the economic means" to give to others, Cardinal Maida said, "every one of us has the ability to pray and find a way to be of service."

Book recounts 1907 West Virginia mine disaster, church's response

Majority of miners were Catholic immigrants, many buried in nameless graves

BY COLLEEN ROWAN
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

WHEELING, W.Va. — At Mount Calvary Cemetery in the small town of Monongah lays a simple lot of graves, some marked and others not.

It is the final resting place of hundreds — fathers, husbands, sons — who came to America in search of a better life, yet perished in the horrific Monongah coal mine disaster of 1907.

Their journey to the United States, their lives in Monongah, the disaster, the church's role in relief and healing, and the aftermath of the tragedy are described in the book "Monongah: The Tragic Story of the Worst Industrial Accident in U.S. History" by J. Davitt McAteer.

He is a former assistant secretary of the Mine Safety and Health Administration who served as special adviser to Gov. Joe Manchin on the investigations of the Sago and Alma mine tragedies of 2006.

For the book, McAteer was awarded the bronze medal in the classification for history books by the Independent Publisher Book Awards this past summer.

The Monongah disaster occurred at 10:30 a.m. Dec. 6, 1907, when an explosion below ground rocked the town and claimed the lives of hundreds — the majority being immigrants from Italy, Poland, Hungary and Ireland who worked in the mine.

McAteer, who is currently vice president of special projects at Wheeling Jesuit University, found the number of those who lost their lives to be significantly higher than the official toll.

"The official number is 362," he said, "but in my research we came up with a more accurate number — close to 517."

The majority of the miners were Catholic and the church in West Virginia and its shepherd at the time, Bishop Patrick J. Donahue, responded immediately.

"The church was extremely helpful in taking care of the families through this process," McAteer said, "and (Bishop) Donahue assigned additional priests there."

Following the disaster, Bishop Donahue and local priests began celebrating Masses for the deceased at churches, yet much to their dismay they were ordered to stop.

"Bishop Donahue had come down from Wheeling and started to work with the local priests" for the celebration of funeral Masses, McAteer said.

"At the request of the public health officer for Marion County, the Masses were suspended and the corpses were buried within an hour of coming out of the mine. ... You had an hour to identify your loved one," he said.

"A lot of them were buried without the names being on the grave," McAteer added.

The reason given for stopping the Masses was concern that contagious diseases could develop if the bodies were not buried quickly.

"That created resentment that lasted for a long time against the company and against the county," McAteer said.

The book also relates the immigrants' journeys to a new country, what they endured and how their lives changed after leaving their homelands to embrace a new home.

"This is a story not just of the accident itself, but about the immigrants," McAteer said.

Describing what their journeys were like, he said: "You left the mountains of southern Italy or of Poland and three weeks later you were underground in a coal mine in West Virginia, having never seen a coal mine in your life."

Despite "absolute dreadful conditions" where the miners worked, he said, they made a life for themselves and their families, struggled and remained in the community even after the disaster.

McAteer said he feels fortunate to have told their story — a story that is at the core of the heritage of all West Virginians.

"It's our history," McAteer said. "It's the history of the people of the diocese; it's the history of the people of the state."

Trusting in God helps us overcome our inadequacies

BY SHARON K. PERKINS
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

For the second time, we're getting ready to put a house on the market, which usually means going over it with a fine-toothed comb and looking for potential deal breakers.

Then comes the inevitable question: Given our budget, what absolutely has to be repaired, remodeled or replaced, and what can we let go?

Watching TV shows on home remodeling and "house-flipping" doesn't help. They prompt comparisons between our home and the showcases, inspiring more fix-up projects that require even more time and money.

For us, it usually comes down to praying for guidance, making tough choices and hoping we get it right in a real estate market we don't know.

In the first reading of this fourth Sunday of Advent, King David saw a problem and envisioned a building project that sounded good at the time — erecting a dwelling for the Ark of the Covenant — so that the house of the Lord of Israel would measure up to those of his neighbors' gods.

But neither David nor the prophet Nathan "got it right." In a play on words, God made it clear that the dwelling was not David's to build; rather, the Lord would raise up from David's descendants a royal "house" that would have a significance far greater than anything he could imagine.

Luke's Gospel picks up that theme and, not accidentally, mentions that Mary is betrothed to Joseph, a member of "the house of David."

But in a startling turn of events, the angel Gabriel makes it clear to Mary that the child whose coming he announces will fulfill the promise made to his ancestor David — not through the intervention of flesh and blood, but by the power of God — and in this way, "the child to be born will be called holy, the Son of God."

Though the outcome was beyond Mary's comprehension, she "got it right" by trusting in God's promise and its incredible implications for future generations.

Every day we find ourselves in situations that cry out for answers and appeal for "quick fixes," and too often we first look to our own insufficient resources for solutions.

Christ's coming, announced anew every Advent, breaks through our shortsightedness, carries us beyond our inadequacies and calls us to hope beyond our imagining.

Questions:

In what present situation are you trying to rely on your own inadequate resources to "fix" a problem?

How can you more fully rely on God's power and find hope in God's promises?

Balance of 'Doubt' is thematic subtext

"Doubt" is an engrossing drama set in 1964 at a Bronx parochial grammar school where the nun (Meryl Streep) who serves as principal suspects a popular priest (Philip Seymour Hoffman) of impropriety with a 12-year-old black student, and together with a young teacher (Amy Adams), sets out to confront him.

Writer-director John Patrick Shanley has successfully adapted his Pulitzer prize-winning stage hit, deftly recreating the Catholic milieu of the era, with outstanding performances, including that of Viola Davis as the distraught mother of the putative victim.

Though sexual abuse is part of the story, it is the balance of doubt and certainty in society at large that forms the principal thematic subtext.

Discreetly handled sexual abuse theme.

'Music for the Soul'

Austrian monks' CD of Gregorian chant is topping pop charts worldwide

BY ANGELO STAGNARO
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

NEW YORK — They're Austrian. They're Catholic. They sing.

That description might make readers think of "The Sound of Music" and the von Trapp family, but the singers in question are Cistercian monks of Stift Heiligenkreuz Abbey, a 12th-century monastery near Vienna.

Their CD of Gregorian chants has become a phenomenal crossover hit topping pop charts around the world.

The monastery was founded in 1133 and its community has continued uninterrupted since then.

After the European release of "Chant: Music for the Soul" in May, it quickly became the top classical album in Great Britain before crossing over and becoming No. 7 in the British pop charts.

Similarly, it has made the top-10 charts in Austria, France, Australia and Sweden.

When the CD was released July 1 in the United States, it became the most popular classical recording. The album sold 55,000 copies in its first two weeks, and sales are still going strong.

In an interview with Catholic News Service while he was in New York, Father Karl Wallner, 45, the monastery's communications director and webmaster, spoke about the growing interest in Gregorian chants, their spiritual significance, and how he and his brother monks are handling their newfound notoriety.

The priest also is the director of the monastery's theological academy, the Pope Benedict Pontifical Institute.

"The Bible is the word of God. Our chants are our way of singing it back to God using melodies from the first millennia," he said.

"Everything is about singing thanks to God. Gregorian chant has always been an intricate form of Christian spirituality," said Father Wallner.

He described the music as "calming" and having "the ability to touch people's hearts."

"Our biggest success is getting people interested in this music," he continued. "This is a special kind of prayer. God has called us to give him our whole lives."

"Gregorian chant is a means by which we can get in contact with God. God is always near to us even though we don't realize it," he said.

"God is a melody in my life. He is a piece of music that is always playing in the background. Sometimes I'm not listening," the priest added.

Gregorian chant is popular with young people, said Father Wallner. He believes that the monastery receiving 28 new vocations in the past five years is a result of the chanting.

"We never thought this CD would be as popular as it is," said Father Wallner. "We're glad about it, but it's still a surprise. We are not Vienna's newest boy band."

This is the cover of the CD "Chant: Music for the Soul," a collection of chants by the Cistercian monks of Stift Heiligenkreuz Abbey, a 12th-century monastery near Vienna, Austria. Their CD of Gregorian chants has become a phenomenal crossover hit topping pop charts around the world.

At first, some of the monks were reluctant to produce a CD of sacred music, but with assurances from Universal Music that the CD would promote Christian spirituality, the hesitant monks came onboard.

"Gregorian chant is an amazing musical style. It heals and brings one closer to one's brothers and to God," the priest said.

He said he was proud of his brother monks for "not getting caught up in this excitement."

"If any of us wanted money, we wouldn't have entered the monastery in the first place," he said. "None of the monks comes to me and asks how the sale of the CDs are going. If they were worried about such things, I would leave the monastery. That's not why we're here."

The monastery earns one euro (US$1.45) per CD sold. In addition, the chants can't be used as part of a video game or grafted into pop music. The Heiligenkreuz monks will never tour or perform publicly, outside of their chapel.

"Money is important to the monastery but not to the monks," explained Father Wallner. "The church has preserved an ancient musical tradition. The oldest in Europe and perhaps the oldest in the world."

"More importantly, it is sacramentalized music; it is dedicated to God and is used to express his love for us. It's important for Christians and non-Christians to learn about this beautiful musical style," he said.

The music expresses "the inexpressible" and communicates "the uncommunicable," he added. "This music is for God and I believe that if people listen to it, they will be open."

The music the monks sing dates back more than a thousand years, and is "sung entirely in Latin, without accompaniment," Father Wallner said.

"These humble, simple melodies serve to purify the soul. It is a ladder into heaven. It is a means by which we can get back to our roots," he said.

Girl Scouts remove 100 pounds of trash from stream as part of project

CHARLOTTE — Girl Scout Troop 3112 of St. Patrick Cathedral in Charlotte has adopted a section of Little Sugar Creek stream in Latta Park in Charlotte.

The Adopt-A-Stream program, sponsored by Charlotte-Mecklenburg Storm Water Services, is a "hands-on" way for residents, businesses and organizations to help improve the water quality of local streams.

Kami Fagan, a troop committee member, suggested the project for the troop in 2007.

As part of a three-year commitment, the troop's 28 Scouts clean the section of the stream and its immediate surroundings twice a year.

Over the last year, they have removed more than 100 pounds of trash and debris.

Catholic officials, organizations launch campaign for climate change

BY JONATHAN LUZMOORE
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

WARSAW, Poland — Catholic Church officials from 38 countries have launched a campaign with more than 70 Catholic organizations to persuade the United Nations to meet the "moral obligation" of tackling climate change.

"Climate change is a reality today affecting the lives and livelihoods of millions in developing countries by exacerbating storms, droughts and natural disasters," said an appeal signed by 92 bishops, archbishops and cardinals.

"As a matter of equity and responsibility, those who have created the problem must pay for the solution. Economically developed nations have a moral obligation to tackle climate change because of their disproportionate consumption of natural resources," it said.

The climate campaign and related appeal were launched by Caritas Internationalis, which represents 162 national Caritas church charities, and CIDSE, a Belgian-based alliance of 16 Catholic development agencies.

The campaign was introduced Dec. 7 at the cathedral in Poznan, Poland, at a Mass concelebrated by Auxiliary Bishop Grzegorz Balcerak of Poznan and Auxiliary Bishop Theotonius Gomes of Dhaka, president of Caritas Bangladesh.

Government representatives from around the world were meeting in Poznan Dec. 1-12 for the U.N. Framework Convention on Climate Change.

The religious leaders' appeal, titled "A Call for Climate Justice," said poor communities were affected the worst by climate change, but had "done (the) least to cause it."

It pledged Catholics worldwide would "stand in profound solidarity" with those suffering harsh effects.

"We are deeply concerned by the disproportionate impact human-induced climate change is having on poor and vulnerable people living in developing countries," it said.

"It is our moral obligation to take urgent action to tackle climate change and to do so in support of those most affected. We call on you to achieve a strong, binding and just global climate agreement to ensure the survival and well-being of all God's children," said the appeal, signed by 15 church leaders from Argentina and four from Nigeria, as well as Cardinals Rodolfo Quezada Toruno of Guatemala and Joseph Zen Ze-kium of Hong Kong.

Auxiliary Bishop Gabino Zavala of Los Angeles, president of Pax Christi USA, and the president of the Commission of the Bishops' Conference of the European Community, Bishop Adrianus van Luyn of Rotterdam, Netherlands, also were among the signers.

U.N. sources said their talks would help prepare a new global climate treaty, to be finalized in Copenhagen, Denmark, in December 2009.

The treaty will be based on a 2007 plan — developed in Bali, Indonesia — under which developing countries agreed to take "nationally appropriate mitigation actions" against climate change if "supported and enabled by technology, finance and capacity-building" from developed countries.

However, they added that funding for mitigation and adaptation efforts in developing countries would be a crucial prerequisite for an agreement.

In their appeal, the Catholic leaders said every citizen had a responsibility "to promote and to protect the common good," as well as holding "governments to account for their actions."

They urged Catholics to follow calls by the late Pope John Paul II by "tackling climate change as one international family."

"Climate change is an issue of social justice and must be met in solidarity by stretching our collective perspective beyond the limitations of short-term interests to one that protects and promotes the common good of all," added the appeal.

"It is imperative these countries receive the economic and technical assistance they need to adapt to climate change and ensure better lives and livelihoods for their people," it said.

The president of CIDSE, Rene Grotenhuis, said industrialized countries had been responsible for 70 percent of all carbon dioxide emissions, adding that billions of dollars currently made available to ease financial-market pressures should not obscure the need to address climate change, which, if neglected, would exert a price "on a human and financial scale we cannot yet comprehend."

A CIDSE statement said Catholic member organizations would run public campaigns throughout 2009 encouraging postcards and online petitions urging governments to support a strong deal at the Copenhagen conference.

It added that CIDSE would relay demands to national leaders to ensure the "shared call for climate justice will keep pressure on international leaders at key moments."

The road to joy

Making a U-turn on the dead-end street of consumerism

Posters in store windows offered $25 coupons for every $100 spent in the days leading up to the Thanksgiving weekend.

Advertisements were replete with buy-one-get-one-free proposals.

The news media had hourly stories on the bleak outlook for retail sales.

Then on Black Friday, the day after Thanksgiving, pilgrims to one of the nation's thousands of temples of consumerism caused a human sacrifice.

Jdimytai Damour, a worker at a Wal-Mart store on Long Island, N.Y., opened the store doors at 5 a.m. that day.

An impatient crowd of some 2,000 was gathered outside for a "door buster." And indeed it was.

The mob crumpled a metal door frame, knocked Damour to the ground and trampled him.

He was pronounced dead within the hour after being taken to the hospital.

One witness described the frenzied shoppers as "savages."

"When they were saying that they had to leave, that an employee had been killed, people were yelling, 'I've been on line since yesterday morning,'" she said. "They kept on shopping."

Damour met his unhappy fate by coming between the savage shoppers and $798 plasma televisions, $28 vacuum cleaners and $69 digital cameras.

Black Friday has become a holy day in the secular religion of consumerism for some time now, the day that retailers showed profitability — black ink — for the full year.

Consumerism is equated to patriotism as well. Recall the president of the United States in the months following the worst attack on American soil counseling citizens that the best thing they could do for normalcy and their country was to go shopping.

Consuming is also touted as a virtue.

Consider This

STEPHEN KENT
CNS COLUMNIST

Warnings about deepening recession and impending depression are used as motivators to prod citizens to buy more.

Personal savings as a percent of income was 2.4 percent in October, up from 1 percent in September, further evidence that selfish and unpatriotic consumers may be recklessly saving rather than spending.

With no little sarcasm, the Vatican newspaper said consumers are being told "the infallible remedy for overcoming the risk of poverty caused by the economic crisis under way" is to "spend, consume and go into debt to keep the economy going."

What people are being told, the L'Osservatore Romano article said, "is that to overcome the crisis it is necessary to continue the same behavior that provoked it, that is consumption and indebtedness."

Some suffer the economic crisis due to factors beyond their control. Some find the irony of being prudent by saving only to see their savings eroded by a greed-infected stock market.

Some used the equity in homes for a worthwhile purpose such as paying college tuition. Others, however, imprudently risked their home ownership by falling prey to insistent messages to buy.

The risks of a consumer economy have not come without warning. There have been cautions for decades that an economy based on consumerism is built on a foundation of sand.

Pope Paul VI in 1967 linked heavy consumption to injustice and Pope John Paul II in 1991 critiqued "a style of life, which is presumed to be better when it is directed toward 'having' rather than 'being.'"

Pope Benedict XVI, in a World Youth Day address last August, chastised those who create "false models of happiness" to lead people down "dead-end streets of consumerism."

Christmas has always been a reminder to find joy by consuming less. This year that reminder comes from reality rather than a matter of choice.

Let us hope this year the reality of dead-end streets can be broadened to allow U-turns to choose the main road of joy.

Shopping days or praying days?

This Advent, we must prepare the way of the Lord

The countdown of shopping days until Christmas has already begun.

While this happens annually, with this year's financial recession the shopping centers and retailers have been trying to lure us into shopping more than ever.

At one store, I heard a familiar Christmas song playing but with an unusual twist: "O come all ye faithful, joyful and triumphant. O come ye, o come ye to — the name of the store!"

Apparently, the store wasn't expecting their faithful to head to Bethlehem but rather to the cash register.

While some of us may go to the real Bethlehem in Judea this year, the Advent season calls us all to go to the "Bethlehem" of our neighbor in need, to the Bethlehem of the lonely who have lost loved ones.

Advent calls us all to make the 30 days before Christmas praying days rather than shopping days.

While the retailers are concerned about how much we shop (the more, the better), the church instead is concerned about how much time we spend in prayer (the more, the better).

We, the faithful, are called to prepare the highway to heaven. We learn this in the idiom of Malachi 3:1 and Isaiah 40:3: "Prepare the way of the Lord."

This message was so important to the Israelites that it is quoted 600 years later by St. Mark the Evangelist (Mark 1:3).

Guest Column

FATHER JOHN C. AURILIA, OFM CAP.
GUEST COLUMNIST

Yet the message, like Mark's description of John the Baptist "clothed in camel's hair, with a leather belt around his waist" as he fed on locusts and wild honey (Mark 1:6), can be uncomfortable. It can take a little work to comprehend.

For me, the most powerful interpretation of Advent is the process of painting.

When it comes to painting something — a wall, a chair, etc. — the most important yet tedious part is not the application of paint but the preparation of the surface to be painted. Often the old paint must be removed; the surface must be sanded, scraped, cleaned before any actual painting can begin.

This Advent, we must not apply new paint if the old layer is still on.

We must pray, we must prepare, but the end result will be worth it.

Father Aurilia is pastor of Immaculate Conception Church in Hendersonville.

Getting ready for his coming

Salvation depends on how we attend needs of poor, vulnerable

"When the Son of Man comes in glory, and all the angels with him, he will sit upon his glorious throne, and all the nations will be assembled before him. ...

"Then the king will say to those on his right, 'Come, you who are blessed by my Father. Inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world.

"For I was hungry and you gave me food, I was thirsty and you gave me drink, a stranger and you welcomed me, naked and you clothed me, ill and you cared for me, in prison and you visited me."

These penetrating words recently proclaimed on the feast of Christ the King — the final Sunday of the church year — direct our attention to the most important final day: The second coming of Christ — the end of history and the last Judgment of the world.

If this Gospel reading doesn't wake us up, nothing will!

Here the disciples and all humanity are warned that our very salvation depends on how well we attend to the needs of the poor, sick and vulnerable.

On that final day, Christ the King will not be impressed by our wealth, professional title or fame. Instead, Jesus will judge us on how well we loved everyone we could, especially those most in need near and far — born and unborn.

Now we find ourselves in Advent, that special liturgical season designed to help us prepare for the celebration of Christ's first coming.

Taking on human nature as a poor homeless baby, Jesus right from the start revealed his deep concern for those who are down and out, a concern that would remain central throughout his earthly ministry — and central to how he will judge us.

Advent, which is the beginning of the church's new year, is the perfect time to make a fresh start in preparing for Christ's final coming. It will be a time we hope the Lord will say to us, "For I was hungry and you gave me food, I was thirsty and you gave me drink."

Therefore, let us commit ourselves

this Advent to doing everything we can to end the suffering of the world's 923 million hungry human beings, to provide clean water to the 1.1 billion people who have access only to dirty water, to welcome our nation's 12 million hardworking and undocumented strangers, and to support the goal of providing health insurance for the 49 million Americans who can't afford to get sick.

Please e-mail or call your two U.S. senators and your representative, urging them to make the needs of the hungry, the thirsty, the undocumented and the medically uninsured major priorities in the next Congress.

And then, kindly reach deep into your pockets and pull out a generous Christmas gift for the world's desperately poor.

When Jesus comes again, make sure you're on his right side to hear these wonderful words: "Amen, I say to you, whatever you did for one of the least brothers of mine, you did for me!"

Faith comes from listening, having relationship with God, pope says

The Pope Speaks

POPE BENEDICT XVI

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Faith does not happen with a solitary reading of Scripture, it comes from being in a relationship with God and listening to his word, Pope Benedict XVI said.

"Faith is not a product of our thoughts and our reflections," the pope said Dec. 10 at his weekly general audience. "It is something new that we cannot invent but can only receive as a gift" that is made and given by God himself.

With an estimated 5,000 people gathered inside the Paul VI hall, Pope Benedict continued his audience talks about the life and teaching of St. Paul, focusing on how the apostle contributed to the church's understanding of sacramental life.

"Faith doesn't come from reading but from listening. It is not just an inner experience but a relation" with someone who proclaims God's love and urges unity and communion in the truth, he said.

The Holy Spirit does not only touch an individual's heart, it also must manifest itself concretely in the world, he said.

"The Spirit must reunite us and truly create a community" out of the divisions and distances separating humankind, the pope said. Christ's Spirit serves to create a visible community with the proclamation of the word and the sacraments, especially baptism and the Eucharist. Christianity, like baptism, is passive, the pope said.

"No one can baptize himself; he needs someone else. No one can become a Christian by herself," he said.

This other who offers the gift of faith and of baptism is the community of believers — the church — which, in turn, is acting on God's behalf, he said.

The church "does not act on its own, following its own ideas and desires," he said. It passively accepts God's will because "only Christ can constitute the church. Christ is the true giver of the sacraments," he said.

St. Paul taught that baptism is more than a mere washing away of sin, it is death and resurrection into a new life in fullness with Christ, the pope said.

He said becoming a Christian is "a new existence, a rebirth, death and resurrection."

The sacrament of the Eucharist is Christ giving himself and his love to humanity so that a new world may be created, Pope Benedict said.

Christ unites himself equally with everyone who receives Communion, he said, making everyone "one bread, one body."

Advent: Season of joy

Turning to Jesus and Mary in difficult times results in happiness; confidence

Advent is the dawn; Christmas is the sunrise.

The shopping malls are already flooded with Christmas decorations, but the times are stark and business is slow. Is Advent really a season of joy?

Yes it is, as long as you remember that "Jesus is the reason for the season."

As we prepare to celebrate the mystery of the Incarnation, God entering our world as an infant, remember that he came to lead us out of darkness into his eternal light: "The Son of Man has come ... to save what was lost" (Luke 19:10).

The sacred texts during the Sundays of Advent guide us along the way.

On the first Sunday of Advent, we focus on the virtue of hope. The Gospel for that day is taken from Luke 21:26-28, reminding us of the second coming of the Lord:

"People will die of fright in anticipation of what is coming upon the world, for the powers of the heavens will be shaken. And then they will see the Son of Man coming in a cloud with power and great glory.

"But when these signs begin to happen, stand erect and raise your heads because your redemption is at hand."

Jesus, therefore, is our hope in all circumstances. Turn to him in faith!

On the second Sunday of Advent the focus is on light. "I came into the world as light, so that everyone who believes in me might not remain in darkness" (John 12:46).

The Gospel on the Second Sunday is taken from Luke 3:3: John the Baptist "went throughout [the] whole region of the Jordan, proclaiming a baptism of repentance for the forgiveness of sins."

The skeptic is filled with hopelessness. He says, "What good is religion, don't you see what a mess the world is in?" He does not see the light of Christ.

We are all called to repentance in order to be purified from our doubts and fears: "Beware that your hearts do not become drowsy from ... the anxieties of daily life" (Luke 21:34).

The third Sunday of Advent is called Gaudete Sunday ("Gaudete" means rejoice).

The liturgy reintroduces the notion of joy, and the Gospel of the day, Luke 3:18, ends with John the Baptist preaching "good news to the people."

In spite of your fears, "Rejoice in the Lord always. I shall say it again: rejoice! Your kindness should be known to all. The Lord is near. Have no anxiety at all" (Philippians 4:4-5).

The Gospel on the fourth Sunday of Advent is taken from the first Chapter of Luke, which tells the story of Jesus' birth. The spiritual surrender of Mary is our inspiration.

When the angel Gabriel announced that she was to be the mother of God, Mary's answer was, "Behold, I am the handmaid of the Lord. May it be done to me according to your word" (Luke 1:38). Mary accepted hardship, trusting in God's power to save her.

The joy and surrender of Mary are two facets of one diamond.

Said Pope John Paul II, "In Mary, the joy of ancient Israel reaches its fullness; in Mary the happiness of the messianic times bursts forth unrestrainedly. ... The faithful are invited to take the Virgin Mother as a model ... becoming vigilant in prayer and joyful in praise."

Turn to Jesus and Mary if you are experiencing difficult times. "Do not be afraid," says the Lord. Lift up your heart with renewed confidence.

The bell tower of St. Bartholomew Church, a mission church on the Rincon Indian Reservation in Rincon, Calif., and a burnt tree are seen after wildfires swept through San Diego County and other areas Oct. 21-23, 2007. The fires destroyed the church and a reported 65 homes, trailers and other buildings on the Rincon reservation.

Indian reservation's chapel, destroyed by '07 wildfires, to be rebuilt

BY DENNIS GRASSKA
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

RINCON INDIAN RESERVATION, Calif. — A solitary bell tower, battered and damaged, stands alone in a barren, muddy field.

The tower is all that remains of St. Bartholomew Chapel, which served for decades as a place of worship and a center of community life for the Catholic residents of the Rincon Indian Reservation in the San Diego Diocese.

The bell tower still bears the scars of the October 2007 wildfire season, which claimed the rest of the chapel as well as the social hall that once stood beside it.

But an effort is under way to rebuild what was destroyed.

Edward Reed, 63, attended Mass at St. Bartholomew for more than 50 years. A church committee member, Reed still visits the site of the old chapel in the evenings.

He likes to sit near the bell tower and take a few moments for quiet meditation.

When Reed looks at the lonely tower standing in the empty lot, he still sees the church where he was baptized, where he received his first Communion and where he got married.

"I still see what was there," he said, "and I always will (for) the rest of my life."

For now, the old chapel lives on only in Reed's fond memories. But soon, he will no longer need to rely on nostalgia or imagination: Plans call for a new chapel to be constructed, bigger and better than before.

In October the community gathered for a groundbreaking and blessing of the construction site.

San Diego Bishop Robert H. Brom, who presided at the ceremony, contrasted the event's celebratory spirit with the "experience of darkness and sadness" during the 2007 wildfires.

"As we bless this space and as we break ground for the reconstruction of St. Bartholomew Chapel," the bishop said, "we're making room for Jesus in a temple that will be built of stone and wood and plaster and whatever it takes to make a beautiful new St. Bartholomew Chapel."

"But more importantly," he added "in our hearts and in our lives, we must make room for Jesus ... so that again and again and again we can move from darkness to light, through sadness to joy until we celebrate in the eternal kingdom light eternal and joy everlasting."

According to the chapel committee chairman, George Arviso, the new structure will be double the size of the original, and its design takes inspiration from the tribe's spiritual and cultural traditions.

Almost immediately after the fire, the Catholic community at St. Bartholomew began discussing the rebuilding of its place of worship.

Insurance money provided the necessary start-up funds, while additional financial resources were provided by the Rincon tribal council.

A benefit golf tournament raised money to cover the purchase of interior furnishings and other liturgical necessities.

By all accounts, the history of St. Bartholomew Chapel dates back to the early years of the Rincon Indian Reservation, which was founded in September 1892 along the San Luis Rey River in northeastern San Diego County.

Some 100 to 125 residents of the reservation regularly attended Mass at the chapel. Visitors to Harrah's Rincon Casino and Resort, which is owned and operated by the reservation, also worshipped there along with residents of other nearby reservations.

Reed said the chapel had been rebuilt once before in the 1930s after a vaguely remembered calamity.

Since the 2007 wildfires, Sunday Masses have been held in the local tribal hall.

According to Reed, the old bell tower will be refurbished and incorporated into the southwest corner of the new chapel.

"In our Indian culture, we like to reminisce on old ways and old things," he said.

Detroit cardinal urges

BY ROBERT DELANEY

DETROIT — Cardinal Adam J. Maida of Detroit emphasized the need for urgent government action to allocate at least enough money to help Detroit's automakers stay afloat until a more comprehensive assistance package can be worked out in the new year.

"People in households throughout southeast Michigan and all across the country are counting on our lawmakers and leaders to help stabilize the domestic auto industry," the cardinal said Dec. 16.

There was widespread anticipation President George W. Bush would announce a financial assistance package along the lines of the $14 billion proposal that failed to win Senate approval Dec. 11.

VATICAN CITY — The traditional decorations of Christmas are reminders that the light and love of Jesus Christ bring new life to all who wait in darkness, Pope Benedict XVI said.

The pope spoke about Christmas trees as symbols of new life Dec. 12 when he met a delegation from Austria, which donated the Christmas tree in St. Peter's Square, and he spoke about Nativity scenes as reminders of God's love for humanity when he blessed figures of the baby Jesus

Vatican document warns certain new

CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

VATICAN CITY — A new Vatican document warned that certain recent developments in stem-cell research, gene therapy and embryonic experimentation violate moral principles and reflect an attempt by man to "take the place of his Creator."

The latest advances raise serious questions of moral complicity for researchers and other biotech professionals, who have a duty to refuse to use biological material obtained by unethical means, the document said.

UPSTANDING CATHOLIC CITIZENS

U.S. President George W. Bush stands with Jesuit Father John Foley, founder of the Cristo Rey Network, after receiving the Presidential Citizens Medal at the White House Dec. 10. Father Foley was among 24 people who were honored for their good works.

Two priests, several other Catholics honored with presidential medal

WASHINGTON (CNS) — Two priests were among more than a half-dozen Catholics in a group of 24 people awarded the Presidential Citizens Medal Dec. 10 by President George W. Bush.

University of Notre Dame professor Father Timothy Scully, a Holy Cross priest who directs the Indiana university's Institute for Educational Initiatives, and Jesuit Father John Foley, executive chairman of the Cristo Rey Network of inner-city schools, along with philanthropists, educators, researchers, the librarian of Congress and actor Gary Sinise, received the second-highest civilian honor in a closed ceremony in the Oval Office.

The citation for Father Scully released by the White House noted that he "has committed his life to strengthening communities through faith-based education that prepares individuals for a lifetime of achievement, service and compassion."

It said he has "developed innovative ways to support under-resourced schools."

Father Foley was cited for successfully reaching some of the country's most vulnerable youths "and instilling in them a love of learning. Through his spiritual leadership of a faith-based education system that partners with the community, he has provided opportunities for young people to achieve their dreams," the citation said.

Sinise, known for his roles as the lead investigator in the TV series "CSI: NY" and as Vietnam veteran Lt. Dan in the film "Forrest Gump," was cited as a humanitarian and a patriot.

"Working alongside our military and reaching out a compassionate hand to Iraqi children, he is helping a society once brutalized by a tyrant to rebuild and realize the great blessings of liberty," said the citation. "He has also traveled the world to show America's gratitude to our service members."

In 2005, Hollywood-based Catholics in Media Associates honored Sinise with its Humanitarian Award for the same type of work. At that ceremony, Sinise thanked his wife, actress Moira Harris, for leading the family to embrace their Catholic faith and inspiring him to commit to service projects.

Dr. Donald Landry, a physician and organic chemist who chairs the department of medicine at Columbia University in New York, was cited by the White House as "a man of science and a man of faith" who has "demonstrated that there are responsible and ethical ways to advance stem-cell research."

Another Catholic, Robert George, professor of jurisprudence at Princeton University in New Jersey, was honored for his work in constitutional law and Western political theory. The citation said George, a member of the President's Council on Bioethics "has brought forceful analytic clarity to the study of America's ideals and institutions."

Retired Admiral James Watkins, a Knight of Malta and the father of a priest of the Archdiocese of Washington, was cited by the president as exemplifying "the American ideals of courage, character and ingenuity. He has brought great skill and determination to all of his duties and demonstrated a patriot's devotion to our country."

Raymond Chambers, founder of the Amelior Foundation in Newark, N.J., where he graduated from St. Benedict's Preparatory School, was honored for aiding at-risk youths and fighting malaria in Africa.

Teach for America founder Wendy Kopp was cited because "through her determined efforts, she has created opportunities for new teachers to help disadvantaged children realize their potential."

U.S. group calls Iraq one of the worst violators of religious freedom

WASHINGTON (CNS) — A U.S. watchdog group monitoring international religious freedom said Iraq should be named one of the world's worst violators of religious freedom.

In a report released Dec. 16, the U.S. Commission on International Religious Freedom said Iraq deserved the designation "in light of the ongoing, severe abuses of religious freedom and the Iraqi government's toleration of these abuses, particularly abuses against Iraq's smallest vulnerable religious minorities."

The commission said "the situation is especially dire for Iraq's smallest religious minorities," including Chaldean Catholics and other Christians.

"These groups do not have militia or tribal structures to protect them and do not receive adequate official protection," it said. "Their members continue to experience targeted violence and to flee to other areas within Iraq or other countries, where the minorities represent a disproportionately high percentage among Iraqi refugees," it said.

The commission, an independent body, makes its recommendations to the president, secretary of state and Congress. Four commissioners out of nine voting members dissented from the decision to name Iraq as a country of particular concern, saying that government inaction or complicity with such abuses had not been established sufficiently.

This report said that although violence has lessened since May 2007, "there has been continued targeted violence" against religious minorities.

The commission urged President-elect Barack Obama's administration to ensure that all Iraqis are protected, specifically by making certain that the Kurdistan regional government upholds minority rights in northern Iraq. Many minority groups are concentrated in northern Iraq.

Church opposes considering homosexuality a crime, spokesman says

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — A Vatican spokesman said the Catholic Church is clearly against considering homosexuality a crime, but is wary of international declarations that use the issue to promote a political agenda based on sexual orientation.

The spokesman, Jesuit Father Federico Lombardi, made the comment Dec. 11 in response to questions at a Vatican press conference.

In early December, a leading Vatican diplomat drew criticism from gay-rights groups when he said the Vatican opposed a proposed U.N. declaration to endorse the universal decriminalization of homosexuality.

The diplomat, Archbishop Celestino Migliore, the Vatican's apostolic nuncio to the United Nations, said such a declaration might be used to put pressure on or discriminate against countries that do not recognize same-sex marriage.

Father Lombardi, said the Vatican was not conducting a battle against the United Nations or weakening its opposition to discrimination against homosexuals, which is clearly stated in the Catechism of the Catholic Church.

The church's position stems from its respect for the rights and dignity of every person, and explicitly excludes "any unjust discrimination on the basis of homosexuality," Father Lombardi said.

The spokesman noted that Archbishop Migliore's comments were made in response to a question about a draft declaration that had yet to be presented at the United Nations or in any public forum.

He said Archbishop Migliore's point was that it's one thing to argue against discrimination and criminalization regarding homosexuality, but another to contend that anyone who makes a distinction based on sexual orientation is considered an adversary of human rights.

Vatican mum on newspaper report of pope's visit to Holy Land May 8-15

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — The Vatican has not confirmed the dates for a papal trip to the Holy Land, but an Italian newspaper reported Pope Benedict XVI will fly to Jordan May 8, on to Israel May 11 and arrive back in Italy before sundown May 15.

Vatican spokesman Jesuit Father Federico Lombardi told Catholic News Service Dec. 16, "The Vatican will announce its program when it feels the moment is right and it has all the elements necessary to do so."

For now, he said he would confirm only that planning is underway and meetings are being held with the necessary government and church officials.

The office of Israeli President Shimon Peres issued a statement Dec. 10 saying a "Vatican delegation responsible for preparing Pope Benedict XVI's official visits around the world" had met that day in Jerusalem with presidential advisers to discuss plans for the possible papal visit.

The Italian newspaper, Il Foglio, reported Dec. 16 that Pope Benedict's trip would follow an itinerary similar to that used by Pope John Paul II in 2000: visiting the Memorial of Moses Monastery on Mount Nebo at Madaba, Jordan, meeting Jordanian government officials and celebrating Mass for Jordanian Catholics before flying to Tel Aviv, Israel.

In Israel, it said, the pope will celebrate Mass in Jerusalem, Nazareth and Bethlehem, as well as meet with officials from the Israeli and Palestinian governments.

Il Foglio also said Archbishop Antonio Franco, the Vatican nuncio to Israel and the Palestinian territories, was to meet with Avner Shalev, chairman of the Yad Vashem Holocaust Memorial in Jerusalem, to discuss a possible papal visit to the memorial, which is a normal part of state visits to Israel.

The Vatican has urged officials at the memorial to remove from a permanent display a photo caption stating that Pope Pius XII did nothing to condemn the Nazis and their slaughter of the Jews.

Il Foglio said the pope would leave the Holy Land May 15 aboard the Israeli airline El Al, landing in Italy before sundown when the Jewish Sabbath begins.

Pope chooses themes for next three WYDs

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Pope Benedict XVI has chosen the themes for the next three World Youth Days in order to help young Catholics better prepare for the international gathering in 2011.

The Vatican published the themes for 2009-2011 in a Dec. 16 press release.

The next international gathering will be held August 16-21, 2011, in Madrid, Spain. The theme is "Rooted and built up in Jesus Christ, firm in the faith." The quotation is taken from the second chapter of St. Paul's Letter to the Colossians.

"We have set our hope on the living God" is the theme chosen by Pope Benedict for the 2009 celebrations, which will be held on the diocesan level.

In 2010, also on the diocesan level, young people will focus on the theme "Good Teacher, what must I do to inherit eternal life?"

The pope chose the themes "to help build a spiritual itinerary that will lead to the international WYD," said the release.

Teaming up for turkey giveaway

Bishop Peter J. Jugis helps load turkeys onto a truck outside the diocesan Pastoral Center in Charlotte Dec. 16. The turkeys will be delivered to 500 families in the Charlotte area.

NBPA and CSS give away 500 turkeys to families in need

CHARLOTTE — The National Basketball Players Association and Catholic Social Services of the Diocese of Charlotte have teamed up to deliver meals to 500 families in the Charlotte area this holiday season.

Bishop Peter J. Jugis joined Elizabeth Thurbee, director of CSS, and Geri King, director of the CSS Charlotte Regional Office, outside the diocesan Pastoral Center in Charlotte Dec. 16 to oversee the distribution of the turkeys to area agencies that serve the needy.

The NBPA is working with Catholic Charities USA, an Alexandria, Va.-based network of social services organizations, and Feed The Children, a Christian nonprofit relief organization, to deliver meals to 30,000 families in cities with NBA franchises across the country.

In Charlotte, the turkeys were distributed to three Catholic churches — Our Lady of Consolation, Our Lady of Guadalupe and Our Lady of the Assumption; CSS; diocesan Hispanic ministry; Loaves and Fishes; Urban Ministry Center; Friendship Trays (Meals-on-Wheels in Charlotte-Mecklenburg); and St. Peter Episcopal Church soup kitchen.

"The NBA has been a significant entertainment presence in the Charlotte region for many years. It is a blessing to all the people of our community that the players have made this generous gift," said Bishop Jugis.

"This food will be distributed to families of many different faiths because God is concerned with the needs of all people," he said.

"We too are grateful for this holiday donation," said Thurbee. "CSS operates a food pantry and, like other agencies serving the needy, it has seen an enormous increase in the number of people asking for help."

in need. Of those meals, 900 were served in the St. Patrick School cafeteria while the other 1,800 were delivered to shut-ins.

Although the food tends to take center stage, there is another element of the event as well — throughout the year, clothing is collected to give to the guests at the Christmas dinner.

The clothing project is conducted primarily by students from the confirmation class at St. Gabriel Church in Charlotte.

Trisha Stewart, confirmation coordinator at St. Gabriel Church, began the undertaking six years ago as a service project for the confirmation candidates.

Since then it has turned into a yearly tradition and has garnered support from other members of the parish community.

"Confirmation is all about doing service to others," said Stewart, who starts handing out trash bags for the clothing collection during the parents' information meeting in the spring.

"I really talk up this service," she said.

This year 125 students from the St. Gabriel confirmation class are participating in the clothing drive.

On Dec. 20, all of the clothing will be delivered to the St. Patrick School gym. The students will come in shifts to sort through the clothes and arrange them on tables and racks around the perimeter of the gym.

"I would love for them to come and see the people who come in," said Stewart. "I don't think the kids realize the impact that they are having."

"Trisha and St. Gabriel's cannot be topped in what they do," said Pete Brehmer, parishioner of St. Patrick Cathedral and chairman of the Christmas dinner.

About 70 percent of the clothing comes from St. Gabriel Church, according to Brehmer. Fifteen percent comes from parishioners at St. Patrick Cathedral and 15 percent is donated from businesses.

In addition to the collected clothing, 200 hats, gloves, scarves and blankets are purchased with donated funds. Fifty of those blankets are given to the Missionaries of Charity in Charlotte.

"That way we know it gets to the right people," said Brehmer.

The rest of the items are given out at the dinner.

Preparation for the dinner begins each September with the formation of a planning commission.

Last year, approximately 750 volunteers were involved with the dinner in some way from start to finish. This year Brehmer is expecting no fewer.

One of the biggest challenges is "just making sure that everybody has a job to do," said Brehmer.

Volunteer times on Christmas day are broken down into three two-and-a-half hour shifts and trained supervisors are on hand to oversee the various departments.

"This year with the economy there are so many people hurting, but people are still giving all they can possibly give," said Brehmer.

"It's one chance that we have yearly to give rather than get," he said.

Christmas decorations a reminder of new life from Christ, pope says

Dec. 14 before reciting the Angelus.

"Before the Nativity scene, we experience Christian joy, contemplating in the face of the newborn Jesus the face of the God who drew near to us out of love," the pope said during his Angelus address.

The day's reading from St. Paul, he said, called on Christians to rejoice because the Lord is near.

Although the Catholic Church believes in the second coming of Christ, there is no need for "alarmism," he said.

"The nearness of God is not a question of space or time, but a question of love: Love is drawing near," he said.

In the special blessing for the Nativity scene figures, which Roman children brought to St. Peter's Square for the occasion, the pope prayed that the figurines would be signs of the presence of Jesus' love in people's homes and families.

"Open our hearts so that we can receive Jesus in joy, that we always can do what he asks of us and that we can see him in all those who need our love," the pope prayed.

In his Dec. 12 meeting with the Austrian pilgrims — including the bishop of Sankt Polten, the governor of Lower Austria and the mayor of Gutenstein — the pope noted that the 120-year-old, 108-foot-tall spruce was the tallest to ever stand in the center of St. Peter's Square.

"In the coming weeks, the Christmas tree will give joy to Romans and to many pilgrims from every part of the world who will come to the Eternal City," the pope said. "I will be able to see it from my window and will enjoy it."

"The nearness of God is not a question of space or time, but a question of love."

Pope Benedict XVI waves from the window of his private apartment as he is framed by the Christmas tree during his Angelus address in St. Peter's Square at the Vatican Dec. 14.

"Its soaring form, its green and the lights on its branches are signs of life," the pope said.

The tree is a reminder that "Christ, the son of God, brings new hope and new splendor to the dark, cold and unredeemed world into which he was born," he said.

In the midst of a rainstorm Dec. 13, hundreds of people joined Vatican officials and the Austrian dignitaries for the tree-lighting ceremony, which ended with the singing of "O Tannebaum."

Catholic school sends gifts to students in need

CHARLOTTE —Students at St. Matthew School in Charlotte have been busy collecting and wrapping presents for underprivileged students and their families at a public elementary school.

Each of the 25 classes at St. Matthew School provided gifts for two families at Irwin Avenue Elementary School, a school with one of the highest-rated levels of student poverty in Charlotte, according to Casey Corser, a parent volunteer.

Deb Gough, guidance counselor at St. Matthew School, started the project several years ago.

"Our principal's wife was the assistant principal at Irwin at the time," said Gough.

"We knew that it was a school that needed help," she said.

The families at Irwin Avenue Elementary School are recommended by faculty and staff based on their needs. A number of the students and their families are homeless.

The families make wish lists that are sent to the classes at St. Matthew School.

All of the gifts are wrapped in school by students along with help from teachers and parent volunteers.

This year, Father Patrick Toole, parochial vicar at St. Matthew Church, blessed the gifts before they were sent to the families.

On Dec. 18, St. Matthew School student council members loaded the gifts on a bus to be delivered to Irwin Avenue Elementary School.

Then, adult volunteers from St. Matthew School personally distributed the gifts to the families.

"When the parents are standing there crying, we all start to cry," she Gough. "It is an amazing project."

St. Peter Church in Charlotte also has a ministry designated to helping the school. The Irwin Elementary Faith Partnership establishes partnerships to promote student academic achievement and create safe environments by identifying needs.

The ministry is currently conducting a book drive for the school. The goal is to collect one book for every student. Books will be presented to the students at the school the first week in January.

'Las Posadas' held at St. Ann Church

CHARLOTTE — The Nativity story was recently celebrated by nearly 100 people in Charlotte.

"Las Posadas" was held at St. Ann Church in Charlotte Dec. 13.

The multicultural Advent celebration, sponsored by the church's Hispanic ministry, included a procession, prayer, fellowship and food from Latin America.

Traditionally, the celebration of "posada" — which means lodging in Spanish — commemorates Mary and Joseph's search for a place to stay in Bethlehem.

Typically a nine-day celebration Dec. 16-24 with origins in Mexico, posadas are an annual tradition for many Catholic Mexicans and some other Latin Americans.

Vatican document warns certain new research violates moral principles

The 32-page instruction, titled "Dignitas Personae" ("The Dignity of a Person"), was issued Dec. 12 by the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith. Pope Benedict XVI personally approved the text and ordered its publication.

The document represented an updating of the congregation's 1987 instruction, "Donum Vitae" ("The Gift of Life"), which rejected in vitro fertilization, human cloning, surrogate motherhood and nontherapeutic experiments with human embryos.

The new instruction expanded on those teachings or presented new ones in the following areas:

— Stem-cell research. The document recognized that stem cells have opened new prospects in regenerative medicine.

It said it is morally acceptable to take stem cells when they do no serious harm to the subject, as is generally the case when tissues are taken from an adult organism, from the umbilical cord at the time of birth or from fetuses that have died from natural causes.

On the other hand, it said, it is always "gravely illicit" to take stem cells from a living human embryo, because it invariably causes the death of the embryo.

— The morning-after pill and other anti-implantation methods. The document said an embryo is constituted after fertilization of the egg, and drugs and techniques that prevent its implantation in the uterine wall are morally illicit because they intend to cause an abortion — even if they don't actually cause an abortion every time they are used.

Anyone who seeks to prevent the implantation of an embryo that may have been conceived, and who therefore requests or prescribes such a drug, generally intends abortion, it said. The use of such anti-implantation methods "falls within the sin of abortion" and is gravely immoral; when there is certainty that an abortion has resulted, there also are serious canon law penalties, it said.

— Gene therapy. It said genetic engineering that aims to correct genetic defects by intervening on nonreproductive cells, a process called somatic-cell gene therapy, is in principle morally acceptable. The effects in this case are limited to a single person.

But is it not permissible to make genetic modifications that seek to transmit the effects to the subject's offspring, called germ-line cell therapy, because of potential harm to the progeny, the document said.

It said that "in the present state of research" germ-line cell therapy in all its forms is morally illicit.

— Embryo manipulation and "adoption." The document repeated earlier condemnations of the in vitro creation of human embryos, a technique often used in fertility treatment, first because it separates procreation from the conjugal act in marriage, and second because in practice unused embryos are often discarded, thus violating the principle that "the human being is to be respected and treated as a person from the moment of conception."

Freezing such embryos is itself a violation of ethics, because it exposes them to a serious risk of death or harm, the document said. Most of such embryos remain "orphans," it said.

Despite the good intentions of people who have suggested a form of "prenatal adoption" to allow unused frozen embryos to be born, such a proposal would be subject to medical, psychological and legal problems, it said.

— Freezing of human eggs. The freezing of oocytes, immature human egg cells, has been introduced as part of an in vitro fertilization technique, in which only those eggs to be transferred to the mother's body are fertilized.

The document said the freezing of oocytes for this purpose is morally unacceptable.

— Human-animal hybrid cloning. The document rejected as immoral recent efforts to use animal eggs to reprogram human cells in order to extract embryonic stem cells from the resulting embryos.

These efforts represent a grave offense against human dignity by mixing animal and human genetic elements capable of "disrupting the specific identity of man," it said. In addition, use of the resulting stem cells would expose humans to unacceptable risks, it said.

'Biological material'

In a section titled "The use of human 'biological material' of illicit origin," the document examined the ethical questions posed for people who, in research or the production of vaccines or other products, deal with cell lines that are the result of a procedure the church considers immoral.

In cases where there is a direct connection, such as embryonic experimentation that inevitably involves the killing of the human embryos, such acts "always constitute a grave moral disorder," it said.

It said the situation was more complex when a researcher works with cell lines produced apart from his research center or obtained commercially.

The document rejected the "criterion of independence," as formulated by some ethics committees, which argues that using such biological material would be ethically permissible as long as there is a clear separation between those causing the death of embryos, for example, and those doing the research.

The document said it was necessary to distance oneself in one's ordinary professional activities from the injustice perpetrated by others, even when immoral actions are legal, in order not to give the impression of "tacit acceptance of actions which are gravely unjust."

"Therefore, it needs to be stated that there is a duty to refuse to use such

'biological material' even when there is no close connection between the researcher and the actions of those who performed the artificial fertilization or the abortion, or when there was not prior agreement with the centers in which the artificial fertilization took place," it said.

In the wider framework, it added, there are differing degrees of responsibility, and grave reasons may in some cases justify the use of such "biological material."

For example, it said, the danger to the health of children could permit parents to legitimately use a vaccine that was developed using cell lines obtained illicitly. In such a case, it noted, the parents have no voice in the decision over how the vaccines are made.

At the same time, it said, people should ask their health care systems to make other types of vaccines available.

Protecting the defenseless

The instruction repeated earlier Vatican condemnations of human cloning, whether done to produce embryos for stem cells or to define the genetic identity of an individual person, which the document called "a form of biological slavery."

The document said couples need to be aware that techniques such as pre-implantation diagnosis, which is used in artificial fertilization and leads to the destruction of embryos suspected of defects, reflects a growing "eugenic mentality."

It cited an increasing number of cases in which couples with no fertility problems are using artificial means of procreation in order to engage in the genetic selection of their offspring.

The document closed with an appeal to view the church's teachings not as a series of "no's" but as an effort to protect society's weakest and most defenseless against forms of unjust discrimination and oppression.

"There are those who say that the moral teaching of the church contains too many prohibitions. In reality, however, her teaching is based on the recognition and promotion of all the gifts that the Creator has bestowed on man: such as life, knowledge, freedom and love," it said.

"Behind every no in the difficult task of discerning between good and evil, there shines a great yes to the recognition of the dignity and inalienable value of every single and unique human being called into existence," it said.

"Dignitas Personae" drew on a number of sources, in particular "Donum Vitae" and Pope John Paul II's 1995 encyclical, "Evangelium Vitae" ("The Gospel of Life").

It also cited the teachings of Pope Benedict XVI, notably his address on stem cells to the Pontifical Academy for Life in 2006.

The Vatican said the new document, as a papally approved instruction of a doctrinal nature, falls under the category of the "ordinary magisterium," which is the church's teaching authority, and is to be received by Catholics "with the religious assent of their spirit."

Officials say Vatican document not an attack on modern science

Instruction is defense of human life's sacred nature

BY JOHN THAVIS
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

VATICAN CITY — The Vatican's new instruction setting forth moral principles in biotechnology should not be seen as a negative attack on modern science but as a defense of the sacred nature of human life, Vatican officials said.

"This is in no way an attempt to say 'halt' to the commitment of science in favor of life," Jesuit Father Federico Lombardi, the Vatican spokesman, said in a statement.

"On the contrary, the document offers a series of guideposts so that science is truly at the service of life and not of death, or of the arbitrary and dangerous manipulation of the human person," he said.

The instruction, "Dignitas Personae" ("The Dignity of a Person"), was issued Dec. 12 by the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith. It presents teachings — and in many cases moral prohibitions — in areas such as stem-cell research, human cloning, gene therapy and embryo experimentation.

In general, the document rejects any procedure that separates procreation from the conjugal act in marriage or presents risks to human life from the moment of conception.

"The church believes it must be courageous and decisive in affirming these principles. The continuity of the development of the human being from the moment of conception does not allow for uncertainty in the defense of the embryo and his dignity," Father Lombardi said.

"This is a position in favor of small and weak human beings, who have no voice and who today, in fact, do not find many who speak in their favor," he said.

Dominican Father Augustine Di Noia, undersecretary of the doctrinal congregation, told Vatican Radio that it would be wrong to see the new document as a series of "no's" against prohibited services.

As Pope Benedict XVI has noted many times, these "no's" are derived from a much larger "yes" to human life and human dignity, he said.

Father Di Noia said the document offers a number of other positive reflections, including appreciation of science and its recent developments, a "yes" to fertility treatments that overcome pathologies and re-establish the normal functioning of human procreation, a "yes" to the therapeutic use of stem cells when obtained licitly, and a "yes" to the value of every human being.

"Some of these affirmations and positive assertions have a negative side, but their principal direction is a positive account, a vision of what it means to be human, and why human life is sacred from conception to natural death," he said.

Archbishop Rino Fisichella, president of the Pontifical Academy for Life, predicted that the document would provoke various reactions. Some will ignore it, some will deride it and others will label it another church effort to impede progress, he told a Vatican press conference.

But many, he said, will share the Vatican's concern and analysis, and others will be prompted by its teachings to formulate questions of their own regarding the morality of recent scientific developments.

An embryo must be treated as a person, says bioethics document

BY JOHN THAVIS
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

VATICAN CITY — The Vatican's latest document on bioethics forcefully stated that although there is no certainty about when a human being receives a soul, an embryo is to be treated as a person from the moment of conception.

That means all human embryos deserve recognition of fundamental human rights, including the inviolable right to life, the document said.

This ethical principle conforms to natural moral law and is also supported by solid scientific evidence about the initial stages of human life, said the instruction, "Dignitas Personae" ("The Dignity of a Person"), issued Dec. 12 by the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith.

Debate over the precise timing of ensoulment has been raised by some who argue that the destruction of an early-stage embryo might not be the same as killing an innocent human person.

The Vatican document said that although the presence of the spiritual soul cannot be observed experimentally, scientific knowledge about the human embryo supports "continuity in development of a human being" from conception onward.

"Indeed, the reality of the human being for the entire span of life, both before and after birth, does not allow us to posit either a change in nature or a gradation in moral value, since it possesses full anthropological and ethical status," the document said.

"The human embryo has therefore from the very beginning the dignity proper to a person," it said.

The instruction builds on the teaching expressed in a similar 1987 Vatican instruction on procreation, which noted increasing scientific evidence about personal identity from the earliest moments of life and raised the question: "How could a human individual not be a human person?"

This argument leaves the burden of proof on those who hold that an embryo is not a person, a point made in 1987 by Cardinal Joseph Ratzinger — now Pope Benedict XVI — when he was head of the doctrinal congregation.

At that time, Cardinal Ratzinger said determining whether an embryo is a person with a soul was a question for philosophy, not science. On the basis of scientific evidence, however, there is "at least a good probability that it is," he said.

He said science shows there is no "qualitative leap" in the life of a child in the period from conception to birth.

"Already in the zygote (fertilized egg) there is a genetically defined individual," he said.

Von Hildebrand project aims to make theologian's writings better known

BY ANGELO STAGNARO
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

NEW YORK — Religious leaders, historians and theologians gathered at a reception in New York recently to honor the writings of German theologian and philosopher Dietrich von Hildebrand.

The reception marked the third anniversary of the Dietrich von Hildebrand Legacy Project, which has been translating von Hildebrand's philosophical works into English.

Von Hildebrand, who died in 1977, left a teaching post in Germany to escape the Nazis. He taught philosophy at Jesuit-run Fordham University in New York from 1942 until his retirement in 1960.

In the years after the Second Vatican Council, he became a prominent defender of papal authority.

Despite his importance to Catholic philosophical and theological thought, von Hildebrand has largely been forgotten by both scholars and laypeople, according to members of the legacy project.

During the Nov. 12 reception, Father Benedict Groeschel, a Franciscan Friar of the Renewal, noted how von Hildebrand has been praised by Pope Benedict XVI and previous popes.

He said Pope Pius XII referred to von Hildebrand as a "20th-century doctor of the church" and Pope John Paul II called him "one of the great ethicists of the 20th century."

Father Groeschel said Pope Benedict had lavished praise for the German theologian, saying, "When at some time in the future the intellectual history of the Catholic Church in the 20th century is written, the name of Dietrich von Hildebrand will be most prominent among the figures of our time."

Alice von Hildebrand, the theologian's widow, told those at the reception that when Adolf Hitler rose to power in 1933 her husband quit his university position and left Germany because he refused to accept the Nazi takeover of his country.

When he arrived in Vienna, Austria, he founded an anti-Nazi journal in which he was outspoken in warning readers about Hitler.

"He was always one step ahead of the Nazis," his wife said. "Fleeing Austria after the Nazis annexed it, he moved to Switzerland, France and then to Portugal, Brazil and then to New York City."

Brian Finnerty, communication director of Opus Dei, said at the reception that hearing Alice von Hildebrand speak was "like touching history."

"She captivated us with story after story, painting a picture of a great man deeply in love with beauty and truth. She is a courageous woman keeping alive the memory of a courageous man," he said.

Peace, salvation come to us through Jesus

BY JEFF HEDGLEN
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

Recently, as I was holding my 3-month-old goddaughter in my arms, I began thinking about the life ahead of her. She has wonderful parents and a huge community of people ready to support her as she grows.

Gazing into this child's eyes as they are just starting to focus, I wondered what she sees and what those eyes will see in the future. There are so many possibilities ahead for her:

Will she be a girly girl or more of a tomboy? Will she be a dancer or a soccer player, or both? What subjects in school will be her favorites? What will she grow up to be? Who will she marry?

The questions are endless.

With each new life that comes into the world, the opportunities and options they have are never-ending. Every baby brought to the church for dedication is full of potential.

This was never truer than when Mary and Joseph brought Jesus to the temple.

In the story from this week's Gospel, we hear of a man named Simeon who had been told by the Holy Spirit that he would not die before he had seen the Anointed One from the Lord. When he sees Jesus, he sees ultimate possibility: He sees salvation.

I cannot imagine what that must have been like. Simeon was in on the biggest of secret plans. He knew that the Savior was coming, and he was one of the first to hold salvation in his arms.

His words shout loudly of faith and triumph: "Now, Master, you may let your servant go in peace, ... for my eyes have seen your salvation, ... a light for revelation to the Gentiles, and glory for your people Israel."

Simeon, upon seeing Jesus, knew the possibility he held just as I did when I held my goddaughter at her baptism. I knew that, graced with the waters of baptism, the doors to heaven are unlocked for her.

On this feast of the Holy Family we learn from Mary and Joseph that when we dedicate our children to the Lord, we open up for them unlimited possibility, for they are now incorporated into the vision Simeon had of the salvation of the world and the glory of God's people.

Questions:

How confidently can you say, "Master, you may let your servant go in peace"? If you are a godparent, what has that experience been like for you?

San Francisco chapel is setting for national TV Christmas special

S.C. monastery featured in hourlong program

SAN FRANCISCO (CNS) — A one-hour television Christmas special set at the Porziuncola Chapel Shrine at the National Shrine of St. Francis of Assisi in San Francisco was taped Dec. 9 and 10 and was to be distributed to ABC affiliates nationally for broadcast at their discretion Christmas Eve, Dec. 24.

Msgr. Harry Schlitt hosts the program. Vicar for administration and moderator of the curia for the Archdiocese of San Francisco, Msgr. Schlitt is a well-known broadcast media veteran.

The hourlong program was produced by the Indiana-based New Group Media for the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops' Office of Digital Media with a grant from the USCCB's Catholic Communication Campaign.

The noncommercial program, directed by Chris Salvador of New Group Media, features a Billy Budd Films claymation re-enactment of Jesus' birth narrated by Christopher Plummer, Christmas carols sung at the shrine and a video segment on the Trappist Monastery of Mepkin Abbey in South Carolina, which houses 350 creches from around the world.

The chapel, which has been declared an archdiocesan shrine in its own right, is a rock-for-rock, stone-for-stone, fresco-for-fresco replica of St. Francis of Assisi's tiny Porziuncola church near Assisi, Italy.

Built on a scale of 78 percent of the original to accommodate available space, the structure features duplications of a 14th-century fresco, of original doors and windows, and of other details of its Italian forerunner.

The original Porziuncola was restored in the 13th century by St. Francis and his followers, and today draws thousands of pilgrims annually. It is contained in a nave of the Basilica of Santa Maria degli Angeli near Assisi.

A featured aspect of the Porziuncola in San Francisco is the encased display of a stone used more than eight centuries ago in the repair of the original Porziuncola, perhaps by St. Francis himself.

Australian Jesuit to head Asia's UCA News, sees growth potential

SYDNEY, Australia (CNS) — Bringing a Catholic Internet news service within the grasp of millions in Asia who use hand-held devices is a logical step for the Asian church news agency UCA News, said its next executive director, Jesuit Father Michael Kelly.

The appointment of Father Kelly, an Australian, is seen as a move to foster telecommunications partnerships that will extend UCA News to Catholics who are young, techno-literate and mobile, and to Asian Catholic communities in other countries.

For the last 10 years Father Kelly has overseen the expansion of Church Resources in Australia. He will continue his role as Church Resources' executive director when he takes on his new role at UCA News in 2009.

UCA News, founded in 1979, has grown into one of the world's largest news services. With its main editorial offices based in Bangkok, Thailand, UCA News employs 40 staff and 250 news stringers throughout Asia.

UCA News disseminates Catholic news and opinions via its Web page, www.ucanews.com. It offers a daily news service in English and supplemental news services in Chinese, Indonesian, Korean, Russian and Vietnamese. It offers a photo service, an online newsletter, special series, Asian church documents and online journalism training.

Father Kelly, whose experience in journalism and publishing dates to the 1970s, said he hopes to bring some of his expertise from Church Resources to UCA News.

"Asia is the fastest growing Web market in the world," Father Kelly told Catholic News Service.

He said Korea has the highest broadband usage in the world and the church is growing exponentially there. But India "has more Catholics than the whole population of Australia and it is a leader in Internet use and software development," he said.

On the Internet, "content aggregation" is a news service's lifeblood, Father Kelly said.

He said UCA News "needs to become medium agnostic and channel agnostic — radio, text, interactive platforms and things the Web makes possible and transforms. It's a broad palette of possibilities."

He said the agency's Web potential is unlimited, not tied to geography.

"All over the world are guest workers whose homes are in Asia. Expatriate Filipinos and Koreans, for example, are the largest subgroups in the United States, and UCA News should speak to them, too. It is really a matter of access," he said.

Cardinal urges quick action on loans for auto industry

By midday Dec. 17 no announcement had been made by the White House.

Such a package was expected to reallocate funds previously approved by Congress as part of the Troubled Assets Relief Program, designed to bail out banking and financial firms, or previously authorized to assist the automakers' switch to more environmentally friendly products. Conditions expected to be attached to the loans included mandatory restructuring and acceptance of a "car czar" to oversee fulfillment of the requirements.

Cardinal Maida acknowledged that changes lay ahead for the Big Three automakers, but urged they be decided through a collaborative process.

"Whatever restructuring is done within the auto companies, their suppliers and the ancillary businesses, it needs to involve all the stakeholders. The situation is urgent and the process needs to provide reasonable, negotiated timelines for all of the parties involved," he said.

The cardinal expressed confidence business and labor leaders in metro Detroit could be counted on "to uphold their part of the bargain and to do the right thing."

"All others involved in these complicated negotiations, especially those in Washington, should follow suit for the sake of our community, our country and beyond," he added.

Cardinal Maida had joined with other local religious leaders — Christian, Jewish and Muslim — Dec. 4 in urging the federal government to extend a financial aid package to the domestic automakers.

"This is a time to stand in solidarity with all who are suffering loss of jobs or homes, and all those who are anxious about what will happen in the future to the automobile industry in metro Detroit," he said at the time.

The square-mile General Motors Tech Center is within the boundaries of St. Sylvester Church in suburban Warren and parishioners include many current and former employees there and at other nearby plants and offices.

Its pastor, Father Gary Schulte, said "fear and confusion" were widespread among his parishioners.

"Many have lost their jobs, and those who are employed are fearful they may lose their jobs," he said.

He noted that bankruptcy for the automakers had not been ruled out if the federal financial aid package somehow failed to come through.

"But," he added, "even if the loans do go through, they wonder whether they will have a job, because it has been acknowledged that more plant closures will be needed."

Msgr. Anthony Tocco, pastor of St. Hugo of the Hills Church in Bloomfield Hills, said prayers for the unemployed and underemployed had become a regular part of the prayer of the faithful at Mass in recent weeks.

Many high-level auto executives, including former Chrysler head Lee Iacocca and former General Motors chiefs Thomas Murphy and Richard Gerstenberg, have been members of St. Hugo. And although none of the current Big Three CEOs is a member, many parishioners are — or were — employed by the automakers, their suppliers or dealers.

"We're praying a whole lot, and — along with prayer — we're adjusting our budget. Our collection is down substantially, and we're trying to cut (expenses) by 20 to 30 percent," he said.

Some parishioners have lost their jobs, and a number of families — especially some of the younger ones who had children in the parish school — have moved out of state to find work. But other parishioners who own restaurants or other businesses are also experiencing the fallout from the auto industry's downtown.

Richard Genthe, president of Dick Genthe Chevrolet in Southgate, said the domestic auto industry already has been restructuring, and added that if automakers get a "bridge loan" they'll continue the progress made over the past three years and accelerate the pace of other planned changes.

Genthe, a member of St. Mary Student Church in Ann Arbor, said automakers and their dealers have been adjusting to consumer demand by changing the mix of cars and trucks available. He also said financing for buyers has improved because a consortium of Midwestern credit unions has stepped in to fill the gap created when many banks restricted their lending.

AROUND THE DIOCESE

Our Lady of Guadalupe

Approximately 1,500 people take part in a procession in Concord Dec. 7 to honor the feast of Our Lady of Guadalupe.

Gatherings honor patroness of Americas

CHARLOTTE — People from around the Diocese of Charlotte took part in celebrations to honor the patroness of the Americas.

Approximately 6,000 people gathered for a Mass at Cricket Arena in Charlotte to celebrate the feast of Our Lady of Guadalupe Dec. 12. The Mass was celebrated by Vincentian Father Vincent Finnerty, pastor of Our Lady of Guadalupe Church in Charlotte, and concelebrated by Vincentian Father Joe Elsi, parochial vicar.

A procession of about 1,500 people marked the third annual Our Lady of Guadalupe celebration at St. James the Greater Church in Concord Dec. 7.

The celebration recalls the miraculous apparitions of the brown-skinned Virgin Mary to the Mexican Indian Juan Diego at Tepeyac, Mexico, in December 1531. She left her image on his "tilma," or cloak.

For 477 years her image has been a symbol of unity, peace, compassion and hope for people around the world. Her apparitions also are credited with the conversion to Catholicism of more than 8 million Aztec Indians.

Juan Diego was canonized in 2002.

"The appearance of Our Lady of Guadalupe to Juan Diego generated the conversion of Mexico, Central and South America to Catholicism," said Jorge Gómiz, Hispanic ministry coordinator for the diocese's Charlotte Vicariate.

"Indeed, the Blessed Virgin Mary entered the very life stream of Latin America and became an inextricable part of Mexican life and a central figure to the history of Mexico itself," he said.

Led by the Knights of Columbus, the procession to St. James the Greater Church included a float carrying the image of Our Lady of Guadalupe, traditional Mexican music and dancing, and recitation of the rosary led by Redemptorist Father Dimas Arce.

After the procession, Mass was celebrated in Spanish by Redemptorist Father Joseph Dionne, pastor. The celebration continued afterward with food, music and dancing in the parish hall.

"The celebration was a marvelous testimony of faith added to the parish life by our parishioners from Mexico and other Latin American countries," said Joseph Kuntz, a member of parish Hispanic Anglo Committee for Unity.

A Mass and festival were celebrated at St. Vincent de Paul Church in Charlotte on the feast of Our Lady of Guadalupe Dec. 12.

The event, organized by the parish Hispanic ministry, also included a procession, traditional Mexican music and recitation of the rosary.

"A wonderful time of fellowship was shared," said Gómiz.

Icon's tour comes to Gastonia church

GASTONIA — An icon of Our Lady of Charity that was blessed by Pope Benedict XVI is currently on display at St. Michael the Archangel Church in Gastonia.

The framed print is one of three icons currently traveling throughout North Carolina as part of the yearlong Marian Hour of Prayer program sponsored by the Knights of Columbus.

A Knights honor guard presented the icon at Mass Dec. 14, where it was blessed by Father Roger Arnsperger, pastor of St. Michael the Archangel Church.

The icon will spend the week in the church. It had been hosted at other churches in the Diocese of Charlotte earlier in the year.

The visit gives parishioners and students of St. Michael School an opportunity to view, learn about and pray before the icon, said John O'Daly, a fourth degree Knight with the William Gaston Assembly 2531.

The apparition of Our Lady of Charity took place in Cuba around the year 1600 when three boys from the area now known as El Cobre were sent to gather salt to preserve the town's meat supply.

As the boys made their way across a bay, they encountered a violent storm. When the storm calmed they saw something floating in the water, a wooden board carrying a statue of Mary holding the baby Jesus.

On the board was an inscription, "Yo soy la Virgen de la Caridad" ("I am the Virgin of Charity"). After that, a shrine was erected in her honor and devotion to Our Lady of Charity spread throughout Cuba.

WHAT IS AN ICON?

Icons are sacred images signifying Christ, who is glorified in them. They typically represent Jesus, but also may depict images of Mary, the mother of God, or saints. Icons express the same Gospel message in images that Scripture communicates by words.

Facing Christmas after a loved one dies

Love can conquer pain of losing someone

Anyone who has lost a loved one knows that holidays, especially, tend to bring back the sorrow in deeper ways. But what we also learn is that the sorrow at these times is different.

It is no longer drenched in pain. What becomes more magnified is the love that never dies.

Recently I received a book that underscores how love endures. "An Advent of Understanding: Facing the First Christmas After the Death of a Loved One" was written by Mary Gay Moore after her beloved husband died.

She wrote:

"The pain of grief following the loss of a loved one makes the brightness of the Christmas season seem like a painful paradox. ... How do we face punch and cookies, gift exchanges, dinner parties or even carolers who assure us that a 'turkey and some mistletoe help to make the season bright' when our hearts are broken?"

But as Moore faced a new Christmas, she focused not on the death but the life she shared with her husband.

Her wise words resonated with me, having lost three sons of my own.

"We need to remember all that God has given us, even though we have lost our great love," Moore said.

"It takes real effort to avoid the tendency to be petulant, and to avoid 'if only' thoughts. Instead we must focus on the years we did have together, the joy, the memories, the fun, the love.

"Whether six years or 60 years, it was a blessed time sweetened by God's many graces and preserved forever in our hearts and dreams."

I too learned that — thanks be to God! — our love can indeed conquer the pain of losing a loved one. But we need to be aware of some things.

First, sometimes friends become distant when you are grieving because they don't know how to deal with your situation.

Have empathy for the pain and confusion they feel too.

Allow those who have not abandoned you to stay in your life. They want to help you with your hard work of living with grief.

The Bottom Line

ANTOINETTE BOSCO
CNS COLUMNIST

Expect that you may have mood swings. While anger is part of your grief, you have control over how much sadness will rule your life.

I remember a story about a little girl who was with a friend and came home later than she was supposed to.

When her mother asked her why the delay, she said she was "helping Jane. Her doll broke."

Her mother asked, "Did you help her fix it?"

The child replied, "No, I helped her cry."

There is great love in that answer.

We should tell our stories. This is a way of affirming the life of the loved one who has gone to be with God.

Here is one of my stories that you may or may not believe, but it happened.

Two Christmases ago, at the end of dinner, I was still at the table with my two daughters and two daughters-in-law. We were talking about my deceased son Peter, smiling over some of our remembered stories.

My son Frank was fixing a game table in the living room, which was behind the dining room where we were. My son Paul was in the family room with my young grandchildren.

Suddenly we heard "Mom" in a good male voice.

I turned toward Frank and said, "Yeah, Frank, what do you want?"

He said, "Mom, I heard that too, but it wasn't me."

And it wasn't Paul in the faraway room with noisy, sweet children.

I believe it was Peter, giving us a love story for Christmas.

To welcome the stranger

Parallels to the experience of Joseph and Mary on the first Christmas Eve

The rejection Joseph and Mary experienced on that first Christmas Eve has many parallels in the United States today.

It's sad to see because, as Ron Suskind wrote recently in the New York Times Sunday Magazine, the "transforming promise of the nation, after all, is the idea of welcoming the stranger, the outcast to a place of limitless possibility — a place where each of us might discover our best self, be comfortable in our skin and find a home."

Incidents of rejection in America today generally break down into two categories.

The first, characterized by evil intent, is motivated by racial or ethnic prejudice, as a recent incident on Long Island demonstrates. After drinking a few beers, seven young men decided to beat up "a Mexican."

On a street in Patchogue, they found Marcelo Lucero, 37, an Ecuadorian immigrant who had lived and worked in the United States for 16 years. Surrounding him, they taunted and punched him.

Then one of them, 17 years old, stabbed him fatally in the chest.

The other category is more like the inaction of the innkeepers in Bethlehem on the first Christmas Eve.

These are respectable people who for one reason or other can't help.

U.S. hospitals, the Times reported recently, repatriate many sick or injured immigrants who cannot pay their bills. This is particularly true in Arizona where funding is scarce and antipathy rampant against immigrants.

Antonio Torres, 19, a farmworker, suffered catastrophic injuries in an auto accident in Arizona last June that left him comatose and connected to a ventilator at St. Joseph Hospital in Phoenix.

After a few days, a social worker asked the parents, Jesus and Gloria Torres, to allow the hospital to unplug the ventilator. They said no.

So because Torres had no health insurance, the hospital packed him in an ambulance and deported him to Mexico. After a four-hour journey to a hospital in Mexicali and still in a coma, Torres languished in the emergency room for days.

St. Joseph Hospital "repatriates" about eight uninsured patients a month. Sister Margaret McBride, a hospital vice president, told the Times, "We are trying to be good stewards of the resources we have."

Not all of those deported by area hospitals are in the United States illegally. Born at University Medical Center in Tucson with Down syndrome and a heart problem, Elliott Bustamante is therefore a U.S. citizen, but the hospital attempted, unsuccessfully, to transfer him to Mexico.

To note, Torres is also a legal immigrant and so are his parents.

The social worker had told his parents there was no hope, but this is a story of hope fulfilled.

With help from their church, the Jehovah's Witnesses, they succeeded in getting the city-owned hospital in El Centro, Calif., to admit their son.

"This was a kid who came to this country legally, worked here legally and had an accident," a hospital official said. "For God's sake, don't we take care of our folk?"

Still in a coma, Torres arrived in El Centro in septic shock, caused by widespread infection.

But after 18 days he awakened, and soon afterward, the hospital transferred him to an intensive rehabilitation program in San Diego, which discharged him at summer's end.

Although still undergoing therapy, he can talk and walk with the aid of a cane.

"We were not going to let our son die," his father said. "And look at him now."

It's going to be a lovely Christmas at the Torres home.

One very special Christmas Eve

Hardships endured make for lasting memories

It was Christmas Eve years ago, and the snow was falling in big, beautiful flakes just the way snow falls on cue in the Hollywood Christmas movies when the climax nears and everything is working out perfectly.

But as I took a solitary walk through the neighborhood, my tears mingled with the snowdrops and fell to the unplowed pavement.

Nothing seemed perfect to me, even as a late Alaskan afternoon was becoming darker and the bright lights from all the houses were twinkling on in the silver dusk.

My thoughts often wander to that Christmas Eve because this is the first Christmas since my mother's death, and that was the last Christmas I spent with her.

I'm from the Midwest, my husband from the East Coast, and we ended up in Alaska. This made Christmas with family difficult.

When there were just two of us, it wasn't so hard, waiting in gridlocked airports and delivering presents crushed in suitcases.

But then came a baby, and although we ventured "home" for the holidays once after that, it gradually became apparent that when baby made three, that journey was arduous.

It was so far, so costly, so weather-dependent, so chaotic that family get-togethers became summer events, and we began to build our holiday traditions with Alaskan friends and our own growing tribe.

Of course, we always extended an invitation to any brave relative who didn't mind the long journey, the flight delays and the barely five hours of dim sunlight we could promise for Christmas.

And one Christmas, my mother and brother agreed to come. We were thrilled. There would be cookies, friends, parties and Christmas Eve Mass together.

I don't know whether they brought the bug with them or whether they were exposed to it by my one child who invariably caught something at the holidays — another reason we avoided Christmas travel.

But Mom and my brother got sick quickly. We're not talking about the sniffles or a low-grade fever.

We're speaking of sprawling on the couch in abject misery, of huddling in blankets with the chills.

My brother, the hardest hit, was diagnosed with pneumonia. My mother valiantly roused herself to attend Christmas Eve Mass.

And so I found myself that Christmas Eve trying my mightiest to maintain a cheerful holiday spirit for everyone's sake, offering warm drinks in festive glasses to wash

For the Journey

CNS COLUMNIST

down the Tylenol.

But at a certain point on that snowy afternoon, I slipped out of the house and had a good cry. It just wasn't fair, I thought. It wasn't the ideal Christmas I had planned.

The Gospel story relates a far from ideal situation that first Christmas. Poverty, plans that went awry so badly that there wasn't even room at the inn, no female relatives in sight to support Mary's labor — it's an odd story to tell about the birth of a king.

But that's the Gospel theme, an upside-down kind of story that debunks all the world's wisdom, that says God's power lies in weakness, that the poor are God's special people, that resurrection can only follow death, that love is the measure.

It's bittersweet to look back at that Christmas Eve years ago. But the disappointment is overshadowed now by the beaming smile I remember my mother bestowing on my kids and me as we sat at Mass, she all dressed up but still feverish.

She loved us so much.

And if I have any belief in the Christmas message at all, I know that in the end that's the only thing that matters.

Economic crisis can reveal true meaning of Christmas, pope says

The Pope Speaks

POPE BENEDICT XVI

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — This year's economic crisis could help people rediscover the true meaning of Christmas and the values of life, love and charity, Pope Benedict XVI said.

After the "consumerist and materialistic scales have been shed, Christmas can then become an occasion to accept as a personal gift the message of hope that comes from the mystery of Christ's birth," he said at his general audience Dec. 17.

The pope dedicated the talk at his last general audience of the year to the importance and meaning of the Advent and Christmas seasons.

At the end of the audience, the pope encouraged people to create a Nativity scene in their homes, saying the tradition is "a simple and eloquent way to remember Jesus who, becoming man, has come to dwell among us."

Here is the text of the pope's audience remarks in English.

Where's Jesus?

It takes little effort to find Christ at Christmas

As we were getting the Nativity set out for Christmas, my 3-year-old asked me, "Daddy, where's the baby Jesus?"

My first reaction was, "He's hiding!" And later, as I reflected on that conversation, it dawned on me that Jesus still "hides" today — not in a stable in Bethlehem, but in the faces of the poor, the lonely and the neglected of our society.

There has been a lot of talk recently about how bad the economy is, and how people are losing their jobs, homes and sense of material security. It has given me a deeper appreciation for how much my family truly has — a roof over our heads, jobs and food on our table.

An increasing number of unfortunate people don't have these things, and Jesus is hiding in them right before our eyes.

Jesus made it clear for us in Matthew: "Whatever you did for one of these least brothers of mine, you did for me" (Mt. 25:40).

The shepherds needed an angel to tell them where to find the Christ child, but we don't need an angel to tell us where to find Jesus this Christmas. All we need is to open our eyes to those around us.

St. Francis of Assisi, who embraced poverty voluntarily as a way of life, said, "The poor don't need us, but we need the poor to meet the Christ who suffers in them face to face." Blessed Mother Teresa of Calcutta, a great champion of the poor, committed her life to ministering to the needs of the "poorest of the poor."

While most of us can't sell everything we have, give it to the poor and join a religious order, we can take Mother Teresa's advice to heart and "do little things with great love."

We could volunteer to help out at a soup kitchen. We could buy a sandwich and drink for the guy on the street corner with the "HUNGRY" sign. We could drop a couple of bucks in the Salvation Army's bucket, and offer a thank you smile to the bell-ringer at the same time.

If we try to make an effort to comfort the "hidden Jesus" this Christmas, we'll be able to hear clearly the angels in Heaven singing: "Glory to God in the highest, and peace on earth to men of good will" (Lk. 2:14).

De Silva is a parishioner of St. Gabriel Church in Charlotte.

Dear Brothers and Sisters,

Today we commence the Christmas novena of Advent by contemplating the fulfillment of the ancient prophecies in the coming of the Son of God, born of the Virgin Mary in the stable of Bethlehem.

Christmas speaks to everyone; it celebrates the gift of life — often fragile or endangered — and the fulfillment of our deepest hopes for a world renewed.

The present economic crisis, causing so much suffering, can however help us to focus on the spiritual meaning of Christmas, and to welcome into our hearts the hope brought by God's coming among us as man.

The word became flesh to offer humanity the salvation, which can only be received as a gracious gift from God. The same word by whom the universe was made, the word which gives all creation its ultimate meaning, has come to dwell among us: he now speaks to us, he reveals the deepest meaning of our life on earth, and he guides us to the Love which is our fulfillment.

In the Christ child, God humbly knocks on the doors of our hearts and asks us freely to accept his love, his truth, his life.

As Christmas approaches, let us rekindle our hope in God's promises and, in humility and simplicity, welcome the light, joy and peace which the Savior brings to us and to our world.

Growing the Christmas spirit

Tree growers share Christmas by donating trees to churches, the needy

BY JAYE ALDERSON
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

OSHKOSH, Wis. — Evergreens have long been associated with the Christmas season. They offer the fresh scent of nature indoors in the midst of winter and symbolize the promise of eternal life.

For Wisconsin Christmas tree growers, the season provides not only the bulk of their livelihood, but also the chance to share their faith.

"It's historical to have a fresh Christmas tree," said Dick Wojcik, who co-owns Wojcik's Christmas Tree Farm in Pulaski with his son, David.

"There is nothing like the fresh odor of a new Christmas tree in our living room," he said.

After teaching biology for 36 years, Wojcik started planting Christmas trees in 1988 as a retirement activity.

"I'm an applied biologist now," Wojcik said. "We think the trees are environmentally friendly, remove carbon dioxide from the air, provide resting places for birds and for other wildlife to live, and they're recyclable."

"A (fake) tree bought from the store is an oil product, and that has to decompose in some landfill," he added.

His farm is a place where people can come and cut their own tree, or have the Wojciks do it for them. Wojcik said the parklike setting offers a fun family opportunity.

Wojcik, a member of Assumption of the Blessed Virgin Mary Church in Pulaski, donates trees to a yearly drive for armed forces personnel in Wisconsin.

Tom Happersett, owner of Happs' Homegrown Christmas Trees in Neshkoro, started working for a tree grower when he was 14. He grew to love the business and eventually started his own.

"I guess there's nothing I'd rather do than grow Christmas trees," Happersett said. "I really enjoy it. I love the outside and watching trees grow. It's creating something."

"It takes anywhere from eight to 10 years to grow a tree and get it to market. And it's very challenging," he said. "You have to shape them with a knife to get the Christmas tree shape, and it's all hand labor. It's kind of like life. You get what you put into it."

Happersett sells trees wholesale in many Midwest outlets, and he has a retail spot in Orlando, Fla., where he has sold for 33 years. He donates trees to organizations such as local churches and the Salvation Army in Orlando, and also to individuals who are unable to afford a tree.

"I think it's something (when) you're giving back to somebody," he said. "I feel that as long as I have the tree, I'm more than happy to donate it."

Sister Pat Flanagan, coordinator for Hispanic ministry for the Green Bay Diocese, serves the Hispanic community in Wautoma and several counties surrounding it. She said Happersett's tree donations to the parish and to area Hispanic families are a blessing.

"The Hispanics have a great devotion to the infant Savior, and they all celebrate this feast with a lot of enthusiasm," said Sister Flanagan, a Sister of the Sorrowful Mother.

"The tree is important because it's a symbol of the time of the Nativity, a time to celebrate the birth of Jesus," she said.

St. Patrick Church in Menasha runs a yearly tree sale as a fundraiser and has bought its trees for a decade from Bruce Niedermeier of ANR Tree Farm in Wautoma. He donates several trees and all the boughs parish volunteers can pack into their vehicles to help parishioners who can't afford a tree.

Joyce Naps, stewardship coordinator at St. Patrick Church, has overseen the parish's Christmas tree sale for the past 10 years. The sale is not about raising money as much as it is about building community, Naps said.

For people who come to look at trees but don't think they can afford one, St. Patrick Church gives them one.

"It's our way to share Christmas," Naps said.

Obama to be sworn in

CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

WASHINGTON — When President-elect Barack Obama is sworn in Jan. 20 as the 44th president of the United States, he will take the oath of office with his hand placed on the same Bible Abraham Lincoln used at his 1861 inauguration.

The use of this particular Bible by the first black man to be elected president of the United States is considered significant because it was used to swear in an American leader credited with ending slavery in the country more than a century ago.

The Obama transition team Dec. 23 announced its intention to use the Lincoln Bible, which also has a Catholic connection, since the man who administered the oath of office to the nation's 16th president was the first

Elections, pope visit, economic crisis top stories of 2008

WASHINGTON (CNS)

— The election of the first African-American president and controversy surrounding the role of Catholic voters in the U.S. campaign topped the religious news stories of 2008, and Pope Benedict XVI and President-elect Barack Obama were the top newsmakers, according to the annual poll conducted by Catholic News Service.

The global economic crisis took second place among the 31 news stories on the ballot. Pope Benedict's six-day visit to the United States in April came in third.

Most first-place votes on the newsmakers list went to either Obama or Pope Benedict, with the pontiff edging out the president-elect by a small margin. Catholic voters were a distant third.

CATHOLIC COACH

Baltimore Ravens head coach John Harbaugh is pictured in his office in Owings Mills, Md., Nov. 11. Harbaugh, a lifelong Catholic and parishioner at the Cathedral of Mary Our Queen in Baltimore, said faith is an important part of his life. He revived Catholic Masses for the Ravens after a gap of several years.

Rookie head coach finds winning combination, takes team to playoffs

BALTIMORE (CNS) — One day this fall, John Harbaugh walked into a barbershop near his home. As the 46-year-old sat in the barber's chair, a hairdresser casually asked, "What are you doing this weekend?"

"Oh, I don't know," he replied, "a little bit of this and that."

The hairdresser was trying to tease a man whose visage has quickly become one of the more recognizable in the region.

A year ago, Harbaugh, a lifelong Catholic, was plucked from relative obscurity to become the third head coach in Baltimore Ravens history. As the regular season of the National Football League came to a close in late December, he had achieved an 11-5 record and taken his team into the playoffs.

Harbaugh steered the conversation with his hairdresser away from his career. He never boasted about his high-profile job; he wanted to stick to the ideals that have defined his life: treating others with respect and staying humble.

Catholicism, he says, gave him those principles.

Harbaugh spend most of his elementary school years in various Catholic schools and has fond memories of the nuns who kept him in line.

After he clapped erasers on the walls, one punished him by making him write a sentence hundreds of times on the chalkboard. Another made him work as a janitor for two weeks after he scaled a church tower so he could clang the bell.

"Accountability was a big part of it," said Harbaugh, whose favorite duty as an altar boy was ringing the bells at Mass.

"They made you be courteous and respectful and not be judgmental of others," he said. "To understand right from wrong was the biggest thing."

Father Christopher Whatley, Catholic chaplain for the Ravens, said the head coach is always at Sunday Mass with other Catholic coaches before games. On the road, local priests are called ahead of time to lead worship.

"He's very prayerful during Mass and very attentive to what I have to share in the homily," said Father Whatley. "He's there to gain some spiritual nourishment."

It was Harbaugh who revived Catholic Masses for the Ravens after several years without them. He also attends a weekly Bible study at the training facility with his fellow coaches.

Even though Sundays are the most high-pressure days of his life, Harbaugh said it's critical to make time for God.

"I think it's a way to honor God and praise God," he said. "You just humble yourself a little bit before God and let him know that these things that we do are for you."

Harbaugh likened his job to that of a shepherd who keeps everyone "moving in the right direction to get them to the pasture we want them to graze in."

"I care enough about the players to be demanding of them — to make sure that everything we do is about attention to detail," he said, "sticking to the plan and not backing out from the values and principles that we think are important."

Before, during and after games, Harbaugh said he's always praying — not for a win, but for God to draw near.

"I used to pray for other reasons, and every now and then, I'd pray for a turnover," he said, "but more than anything else, I want God to stay close to me so I don't get caught up in myself and basically embarrass myself. That's selfish behavior."

California man in Santa suit kills eight, then self; was church usher

COVINA, Calif. (CNS) — A man dressed in a Santa suit who opened fire at his former in-laws' Christmas Eve party in Covina then set the house ablaze, killing at least eight people, had been an usher at Holy Redeemer Catholic Church in Montrose, Calif.

The gunman, Bruce Pardo, killed himself hours after what police described as a revenge attack on his ex-wife and her parents, all of whom were believed to be among the dead, along with at least five others, at the Covina home 25 miles east of Los Angeles.

The victims had been attending an annual Christmas party when Pardo knocked at the family's door. He shot an 8-year-old girl in the face after she answered the door, and then began firing at the guests indiscriminately with a semiautomatic handgun.

People ran from the home, jumped out windows and hid behind furniture during the barrage of gunfire.

After his shooting rampage, Pardo set the house ablaze allegedly by using a pressurized fuel tank he carried in a large box wrapped as a present. At least three people, including the girl who answered the door, were hospitalized but were expected to recover.

The gunman, who had been a regular usher for the Sunday evening Masses at Holy Redeemer for the past five years, had signed up to usher for the parish's midnight Mass but did not show up at the church that night.

"This is shocking," said Jan Detanna, the parish's usher coordinator. "He was the nicest guy you could imagine. Always a pleasure to talk to, always a big smile."

Pardo, 45, did not have a criminal record or any history of violence. According to police he was angry about the settlement of his divorce in mid-December from Sylvia Ortega; their marriage had lasted less than one year.

FROM THE VATICAN

Vatican agency says at least 20 church workers killed in 2008

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — At least 20 church workers were killed in 2008, demonstrating that Catholic men and women — bishops, priests, religious and laity — continue placing their lives at risk in order to proclaim the Gospel and serve the poor, said the Vatican's Fides news agency.

Publishing its annual list of missionaries killed during the year, the agency of the Congregation for the Evangelization of Peoples said all Catholics have an obligation to remember those who sacrificed their lives, to thank God for their witness and to resolve to be more courageous in demonstrating their own faith.

"In profoundly different situations and contexts, according to their own talents, attitudes and with their own limits, all of them consecrated their lives to the unique mission of proclaiming and witnessing to the love of Christ, who died and rose again for the salvation of mankind," said a Dec. 30 Fides statement.

"Without heroics or solemn proclamations, they did not hesitate to put their lives at risk each day in many different contexts of suffering, poverty and tension," Fides said.

Chaldean Archbishop Paulos Faraj Rahho of Mosul, Iraq, led Fides' 2008 list.

The 65-year-old archbishop was kidnapped Feb. 29 in an attack that left his driver and two bodyguards dead.

His body was recovered two weeks later after the kidnappers told Catholic leaders in Iraq where he had been buried.

The list also included 16 priests, one religious brother and two Catholic lay workers.

Vatican supports ending violence against homosexuals, not new rights

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — The Vatican said it condemns all forms of violence against homosexuals, but does not support a proposed U.N. declaration recognizing "sexual orientation" and "gender identity" as new categories that need human rights' protections.

"Despite the declaration's rightful condemnation of and protection from all forms of violence against homosexual persons, the document, when considered in its entirety, goes beyond this goal and instead gives rise to uncertainty in the law and challenges existing human rights norms," a Vatican statement said.

The statement, issued by the office of the Vatican's apostolic nuncio to the United Nations, Archbishop Celestino Migliore, was submitted Dec. 18 during the U.N. General Assembly's discussion of a proposed Declaration on Human Rights, Sexual Orientation and Gender Identity.

The statement said the Vatican appreciates efforts in the declaration aimed at condemning all forms of violence against homosexuals and urging nations to put an end to all criminal penalties against them.

However, the declaration's wording and its introduction of new categories for human rights' protections go "well beyond the above-mentioned and shared intent," it said.

The new categories of "sexual orientation" and "gender identity," it said, "find no recognition or clear and agreed definition in international law."

If these were added to the list of protected human rights' categories, it "would create serious uncertainty in the law as well as undermine the ability of states to enter into and enforce new and existing human rights conventions and standards," the statement said.

It said the Vatican "continues to advocate that every sign of unjust discrimination toward homosexual persons should be avoided and urges states to do away with criminal penalties against them."

A family of faith

People take part in a Mass in Madrid, Spain, Dec. 28 promoting the traditional family. Thousands of Spaniards attended the Mass on the feast of the Holy Family.

During the Angelus Dec. 28, Pope Benedict XVI spoke in Spanish as he sent his best wishes to those gathered in Madrid "to pray for the family and to commit themselves to working on its behalf with strength and hope."

The pope prayed that all Christian families would model their relationships on those of Jesus, Mary and Joseph, working together, trusting in God and taking care of one another.

"The family certainly is a grace of God, which allows us to see who he is: love," Pope Benedict said.

Vatican: Number of people at papal events leveling off

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — The number of pilgrims and visitors coming to Rome to see the "new" pope appears to be leveling off.

In 2008, more than 2.21 million people saw Pope Benedict XVI in person at the Vatican or the papal villa at Castel Gandolfo, attending his weekly general audience, a special audience with him, a liturgy he celebrated or his Sunday Angelus address, according to figures released by the Prefecture of the Pontifical Household Dec. 29.

The total figure for 2007 was more than 2.8 million pilgrims and visitors, while in 2006 — his first full calendar year as pope — the total was more than 3.2 million. According to the 2008 statistics, a total of 534,500 people attended one of Pope Benedict's 42 weekly general audiences. Another 226,500 people were part of groups that had a special audience with the pope.

Pope Benedict's Masses and prayer services drew 324,000 people and his Sunday and holy day recitation of the Angelus brought 1.13 million people to St. Peter's Square or Castel Gandolfo.

Obama to be sworn in with Bible Lincoln used at first inauguration

Catholic chief justice of the United States.

Obama encouraged comparisons between himself and Lincoln during the presidential campaign, which he kicked off in early 2007 on the steps of the Old Illinois State Capitol in Springfield, where Lincoln delivered his legendary "House Divided" speech in 1858 about the dangers of continuing to maintain a nation that was "half slave, half free."

The Jan. 20 inauguration also comes a few weeks before the 200th anniversary of Lincoln's Feb. 12, 1809, birth.

The worn, pinkish, velvet-covered Bible used during the 1861 inauguration of Lincoln isn't necessarily considered a significant book, except for the fact that it was used to swear in the man who is credited with preserving the nation during one of its bleakest periods in history, said Mark Dimunation, chief of the Rare Book and Special Collections Division of the Library of Congress, where the Bible is currently stored.

An interesting sidelight about Lincoln's first inauguration brought to mind by the Bible is that Chief Justice Roger Taney, a Marylander, was required

"The use of this historic Bible will provide a powerful connection to our common past and common heritage."

— Emmett Beliveau

to administer the oath of office to a man with whom he would continue to cross swords for the next three years.

Taney was a bitter political rival of Lincoln's and the author of the Supreme Court's Dred Scott decision in 1857 that would indirectly lead to the Civil War.

"President-elect Obama is deeply honored that the Library of Congress has made the Lincoln Bible available for use during his swearing-in," said Emmett Beliveau, executive director of the Presidential Inaugural Committee, in a written statement released by the Obama transition team.

"The president-elect is committed to holding an inauguration that celebrates America's unity, and the use of this historic Bible will provide a powerful connection to our common past and common heritage," he said.

Bible background

The 1,280-page Bible was purchased by William Thomas Carroll, clerk of the Supreme Court, for Lincoln's March 4, 1861, inauguration, because the Lincoln family Bible was still en route from Springfield, packed away with the first family's belongings, the transition team's statement said.

The back of the Bible is adorned with the seal of the Supreme Court and a statement that reads "I, William Thomas Carroll, clerk of the said court, do hereby certify that the preceding copy of the holy Bible is that upon which the Honorable R.B. Taney, chief justice of the said court, administered to His Excellency, Abraham Lincoln, the oath of office as president of the United States."

The Library of Congress actually has thousands of Bibles in more than 150 languages, about 1,500 of which are considered significant editions for their rare or historic value, Dimunation told Catholic News Service last summer, as he allowed two CNS staff members to hold the Lincoln Bible.

Most of the rare Bibles were gifts to the library, but others have been purchased and varied in price depending on their significance, he said.

"You can't really put a price tag on these books, from a curator's point of view," Dimunation said.

"We are a major resource for the study of the Bible," he said. "We never talk about the money. It gives people the wrong sense of these books, with texts that remain a valid expression for all sorts of interests."

The Library of Congress planned to place the 1861 inaugural Lincoln Bible on display from Feb. 12 to May 9 as part of its exposition, "With Malice Toward None: The Abraham Lincoln Bicentennial Exhibition."

Deepening concerns

Financial woes leave millions wondering how far down economy can go

BY DENNIS SADOWSKI
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

WASHINGTON—History likely will frame 2008 as the year America overcame lingering questions about racism as the country elected its first African-American president in Barack Obama.

But even such a historic election could be overshadowed by the deepening concern about just how far the U.S. economy would sink into recession in the worst economic slump since the Great Depression.

The majority of electoral analysts agreed people voted their pocketbooks Nov. 4, thinking Obama offered them a better chance to save their homes from foreclosure, create jobs and spur an economic turnaround in a shorter period of time than Republican John McCain.

However, as the year drew to a close, the consensus among financial analysts, economists and government policymakers was that any recovery would be more than a year away.

Obama himself acknowledged things would get worse before they got better.

Recent economic projections bore that out:

— The financial firm Goldman Sachs, after adjusting its projections for unemployment twice since October, predicted the figure would reach at least 9 percent in 2009.

Unemployment stood at 6.7 percent in November, according to the Bureau of Labor Statistics.

— The Washington-based Center on Budget and Policy Priorities expected that such a high rate of unemployment could translate into as many as 10.3 million people falling into poverty.

That figure included up to 6.3 million people lapsing into deep poverty, which includes those whose income is below half of the poverty line, which was about $11,500 for a family of four in 2007.

— The gross domestic product — the value of services and goods produced — was expected to fall for another year.

The consensus on Wall Street and among Washington policymakers was that it would be well into 2010 before even a minimal turnaround could be expected.

— The Big Three automakers — General Motors, Chrysler and Ford — faced an even bleaker future after Senate Republicans objected to a $14 billion loan package that earlier was approved by the House of Representatives, though the White House was trying to work out a rescue plan to help the companies in the short term as they retooled their business models.

— Home foreclosures had declined slightly by early December but remained at near-record levels.

Housing values continued to decline and prices were expected to tumble another 10 percent to 15 percent before the market began to recover.

In it together

The bad forecasts came despite frenetic federal efforts to bail out U.S. banks, which faced shortfalls in revenues thanks largely to defaults on mortgage payments by homeowners deep in debt.

After a week of intense negotiations, the Bush administration and Congress agreed to a $700 billion infusion of funds for banks.

Such dire economic news got the attention of the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops, which at its annual November meeting in Baltimore agreed to a statement issued by Cardinal Francis E. George of Chicago, conference president.

The statement expressed solidarity with those who lost jobs, had their homes foreclosed on and saw retirement savings threatened.

"We are all in this together," the statement said.

Citing the human and moral consequences of the crisis, the statement said the church would continue to "reach out to those in need, stand with those who are hurt and work for policies that bring greater compassion, accountability and justice to economic life."

Pope Benedict XVI spoke about the world economy several times after the near collapse of financial systems in September. He reserved his strongest comments for the Jan. 1 celebration of the World Day of Peace.

In his message, titled "Fighting Poverty to Build Peace" and released Dec. 11, the pope said global governance and a new ethical approach were needed for the world's financial markets and international commerce so investments and development would contribute to the common good and to world peace.

Policies and norms must be based on a common code of ethics and actions must be guided by the principles of "fraternity and responsibility," he said.

The growing poor

Traders work on the floor of the New York Stock Exchange Nov. 25, 2008. The financial woes of 2008 have left millions of people wondering how far down the economy can go.

Catholic Charities USA was working to address the growing need for food, housing, financial assistance and health care amid cuts in government funds that local agencies were experiencing.

A fall survey of local Catholic Charities agencies found more middle-class people turning to the diocesan agencies for basic needs in addition to a growing number of the poor.

During a Dec. 11 teleconference, Catholic Charities officials called upon the federal government to boost support for lower income people "on the back street" the same way they supported financial firms on Wall Street and talked about assistance for the middle class on Main Street.

"This is a great opportunity in the economic recovery so that the people who were left out in the past will be included in the future recovery package," Candy Hill, senior vice president for social policy and government affairs at Catholic Charities USA, told dozens of the agency's diocesan affiliates.

"We're trying to make sure this is an inclusive package," she said.

Failing Flint

Few places illustrated the devastation of the economic crisis better than Flint, Mich., 60 miles northwest of Detroit.

The city where General Motors Corp. was born a century ago, Flint defined what it meant to be the modern American industrial city throughout the 20th century, building its economy around the automobile.

While Flint has been losing automobile-related jobs since the 1980s, losing what's left of the car industry would destroy the city, said Rick Carter, executive director of Flint Area Congregations Together, a coalition of about 15 Catholic, Protestant, African-American and Unitarian churches.

The concern in Flint and other similar communities was the Big Three would be forced to declare bankruptcy and end support of health care and pension programs for retirees and their spouses, Carter said.

Unemployment in the once prosperous blue-collar community was approaching 10 percent. Where once the automobile industry in Flint employed 80,000, only about 8,000 jobs remained.

The city's population declined from a peak of nearly 197,000 in 1960 to the current U.S. Census Bureau estimate of 114,000.

Based at St. John Vianney Church, the Flint-area coalition was working to address growing social ills such as safety, youth violence, abandoned housing and corruption in local politics, Carter said.

"It's the economy, the lack of jobs, the disinvestment," Carter said, explaining the flight of manufacturing firms, who have left behind vast tracts of vacant and abandoned properties.

"There's no investment in the community," he said.

Because of its lack of economic progress, the city was designated by Forbes.com as one of the country's fastest dying cities.

While the example of Flint may be extreme, the Michigan city was not alone as 2008 came to a close.

Former manufacturing centers in Ohio and Indiana in particular were finding the worst economic decline in 80 years to be a challenge almost impossible to overcome.

To help unemployed workers, parishes like St. Basil the Great in Brecksville, Ohio, a Cleveland suburb, started employment services to aid not just laid-off factory workers but professionals as well.

The economic downturn also left Catholic universities and other Catholic institutions facing staff and budget cuts because investment income declined and charitable gifts were becoming fewer in number.

Better because of Benedict

U.S. Catholics receive strong dose of encouragement from pope's visit

BY CAROL ZIMMERMANN
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

WASHINGTON — U.S. Catholics were repeatedly encouraged to find renewed hope in Christ during Pope Benedict XVI's April 15-20 visit to the United States.

Whether the pope was addressing international or religious leaders, youths or the Catholics who filled baseball stadiums in Washington and New York, he continually reiterated the trip's theme, "Christ Our Hope," and earnestly spoke of a "new springtime" for the American church.

The pontiff, in his first visit to the United States as pope, celebrated Mass at the ballparks in both cities and spoke at the White House, the General Assembly of the United Nations and at churches in Washington and New York.

He also departed from his planned itinerary for a private meeting with victims of the clergy sex abuse crisis.

He often spoke of the "genuinely religious spirit" of the American people and praised the vitality of parish life and church movements. But he also encouraged U.S. Catholics to take their faith experience to a deeper level by evangelizing with renewed zeal and rejecting secularism.

Instead of criticizing U.S. Catholics as some commentators had predicted, the pope gently urged them to be unified and to be a beacon of hope in the modern world.

The visit had been highly anticipated since it was announced in November 2007. Many wondered how the scholarly pontiff would compare with the crowd-pleasing Pope John Paul II.

But in all the public venues the cheering crowds dispelled the notions of Americans not warming up to Pope John Paul's successor.

Encouraging words

There was pre-visit speculation about whether the pope would address the clergy abuse scandal — which he did several times — and what he would say to Catholic college presidents — he offered them words of encouragement.

Right from the start — aboard the papal flight to the United States — Pope Benedict addressed the clergy abuse crisis that had scarred the U.S. church, saying he was "deeply ashamed" by it.

Throughout the U.S. visit he condemned the abuse scandal and spoke of the urgent need for healing.

During a Mass at St. Patrick's Cathedral in New York for priests and religious, the pope urged the congregation to move past divisions and scandal toward a "new sense of unity and purpose."

In other gatherings he sounded warnings on the dangers of secularism and the misuse of freedom.

During an April 17 Mass at Nationals Park, Washington's baseball stadium, he told 45,000 people that American society is at a moral crossroads.

Three days later at a Mass at New York's Yankee Stadium, the pope urged more than 57,000 Catholics "to use wisely the blessings of freedom in order to build a future of hope for coming generations."

Pope Benedict also made a special appeal to young people at the Yankee Stadium Mass, urging them to "step forward and take up the responsibility which your faith in Christ sets before you."

He offered a similar challenge to about 25,000 youths the previous day during a rally at St. Joseph's Seminary in Yonkers, N.Y.

In Washington, the pope urged 400 Catholic college presidents and diocesan education representatives at The Catholic University of America to lead students to deeper faith.

He also told about 200 representatives of Islam, Jainism, Buddhism, Hinduism and Judaism at the Pope John Paul II Cultural Center "to persevere in their collaboration" to serve society and enrich public life.

Whirlwind visit

The pope began his U.S. visit by meeting privately with President George W. Bush after he was greeted by thousands of well-wishers during a public welcoming ceremony on the White House lawn.

He spoke to about 300 U.S. bishops at the Basilica of the National Shrine of the Immaculate Conception encouraging them to continue their work to restore trust in the church and its ministers.

In New York, he told the U.N. General Assembly that fundamental human rights "cannot be applied piecemeal" and cannot be denied or diminished because of "different cultural, political, social and even religious outlooks."

One of his most somber visits was at Ground Zero where the pope knelt alone and offered a silent prayer.

He also read a prayer aloud with a small group at his side representing survivors, the family members of the dead and representatives of the New York Port Authority, police and fire departments.

At an ecumenical prayer service in New York he expressed concern that Christianity could slip into "fragmentation and a retreat into individualism."

Pope Benedict met separately with the Jewish participants in the interreligious meeting. He also visited a New York synagogue.

The pope had two occasions of his own to mark while in the United States: his 81st birthday and the third anniversary of his election as pope.

After his departure, many U.S. Catholics said they felt a deeper connection with their spiritual leader and that the effects of the visit would last beyond the six-day trip as they planned to read and reread the texts of his speeches.

For many, what stood out the most was not the huge crowds at papal events but his private meeting at the apostolic nunciature in Washington with five victims of clergy sexual abuse.

One observer summed it up by saying the pope did "exactly what American Catholics needed and wanted to see" from the person who is the highest authority in the church.

Presidential election caps dramatic year

Economy a major issue for voters

BY PATRICIA ZAPOR
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

WASHINGTON — The election of Sen. Barack Obama as president Nov. 4 climaxed a dramatic political year in which the faltering economy ultimately steered voters' decisions.

While Obama's election was historic in many ways, the campaign between Obama, an Illinois Democrat, and Republican nominee Sen. John McCain of Arizona had its own particular religious angles of interest.

Before it came down to voters who were worried primarily about the economy, the campaign had veered off into stories about the clergy who advised or endorsed the candidates and disagreements among some in the Catholic Church about their moral obligations in voting.

The election also brought ballot measures on which the Catholic Church weighed in, including those about same-sex marriage, regulations on abortion, assisted suicide, embryonic stem-cell research, gambling and taxes to aid the needy.

At the top of the ballot, Obama won a slightly higher percentage of votes among Catholics, 54 percent to 45 percent for McCain, than among all voters, 53 percent of whom chose Obama while 46 percent voted for McCain.

Latinos were a significant factor in the Catholic portion of the vote, with 67 percent supporting Obama. Like white voters overall, white Catholics more strongly supported McCain over Obama, by 52 percent to 47 percent. Latinos make up about 40 percent of U.S. Catholics.

In the new year analysts will still be debating how much Catholic voters were influenced by the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops' election guide, "Forming Consciences for Faithful Citizenship," and by the statements of some bishops who warned that voting should be based on the candidates' record on abortion.

Groups such as Catholics in Alliance for the Common Good, the Matthew 25 Network, Catholics United and Democrats for Life had a significant national role in arguing that voting based on Christian morals was more complex than only seeking to make abortion illegal.

Two prominent pro-life Catholic law professors, Douglas Kmiec of Pepperdine University in Malibu, Calif., and Nicholas Cafardi, dean emeritus and professor at Duquesne University in Pittsburgh, came under fire for their endorsements of Obama.

U.S. President-elect Barack Obama arrives in Chicago to speak to supporters with his wife, Michelle, and their children, Sasha and Malia, after being declared the winner of the 2008 U.S. presidential election Nov. 4. Obama is the first African-American to be elected president.

and civil lawyer, resigned from the board of trustees of Ohio's Franciscan University of Steubenville after writing that a committed Catholic voter should consider a long list of "intrinsically evil acts" that includes but is not limited to abortion.

Kmiec, former dean of the law school at The Catholic University of America in Washington and a Republican who helped craft the Reagan administration's legal challenges to Roe v. Wade, wrote a book explaining his support for Obama, "Can a Catholic Support Him? Asking the Big Questions About Barack Obama."

He argued that after more than 30 years of the pro-life movement focusing almost entirely on trying to reverse Roe v. Wade, with little progress or hope for success, he was prepared to take Obama at his word that he would work to reduce abortions by measures such as providing better health care and social services aid for the poor.

At one point, Kmiec was denied Communion during a Mass for a Catholic business group by a priest who chastised him from the pulpit. The priest later apologized, after the intervention of Los Angeles Cardinal Roger M. Mahony.

At the annual USCCB general meeting in mid-November, the bishops approved a statement on the election.

In it they said they looked forward to working with Obama, but went on to warn against interpreting the election outcome as "a referendum on abortion" and said "aggressively pro-abortion policies, legislation and executive orders will permanently alienate tens of millions of Americans."

Clergy and controversy

Earlier in the year, McCain and Obama both had to distance themselves from ministers who stirred controversy.

Obama and his wife severed ties with their Chicago church, Trinity United Church of Christ, after videos of bombastic sermons by its former pastor, Rev. Jeremiah Wright, were posted on YouTube.

A Chicago archdiocesan priest, Father Michael Pfleger, was required to take a leave of absence from his pastoral duties at St. Sabina Church after, as a guest preacher at Trinity, he made disparaging remarks about Democratic presidential candidate Sen. Hillary Clinton of New York.

McCain rejected the endorsement of two televangelists. Rev. John Hagee, pastor of a San Antonio megachurch, had described the Catholic Church as "the great whore" and a "false cult system," among other statements.

McCain also repudiated the backing of Rev. Rod Parsley of the World Harvest Church of Columbus, Ohio, who has described Islam as the "Antichrist."

Other issues

Beyond the presidential race, in states where it was an election issue, voters agreed with the Catholic Church's stance against legalizing gay marriage.

Voters in California, Arizona and Florida approved changes to state constitutions to define marriage as the union of one man and one woman. Connecticut voters rejected an effort to call a constitutional convention to overturn that state's prevailing Supreme Court ruling that allows same-sex marriage.

On other statewide issues, positions taken by Catholic Church leaders were on the losing side. California rejected a proposal requiring parental notification before a minor could have an abortion, and South Dakota voters rejected a ban on nearly all abortions.

Voters in Washington made theirs the second state in the union to allow physician-assisted suicide. And Michigan voters agreed to expand embryonic stem-cell research and barred laws that would limit such research or treatments.

Gambling initiatives opposed by the local church in Maryland and Ohio passed, allowing slot machines in the former and a privately owned casino in southwestern Ohio.

Measures passed in two Missouri counties to raise money for children's services with a sales tax increase. A Massachusetts effort to repeal the state income tax failed.

The local church had supported each of those outcomes as necessary to help meet the needs of the poor.

St. Matthew "YOU"niversity presents – From the Pope to St. Paul to our Priests – and now to YOU!

Pope Benedict XVI had three reasons for proclaiming 2008-2009 the year of St. Paul. He hopes to encourage a scholarly study of the Pauline corpus. He hopes this will lead to an increase of daily study of Paul, deep spiritual reflection on his life and writings, and an explosion of desire on the part of all of us to pattern ourselves after Paul, as Paul patterned himself after the Lord.

In union with our Pope, in communion with our Church, the priests of St. Matthew offer these lectures as part of St. Matthew "YOU"niversity adult enrichment.

Note: In order for you to get the very most out of these lectures, you are invited to read prior to the lecture the designated St. Paul letter and the appropriate chapter from Father Raymond Brown's "Introduction to the New Testament": Anchor Bible Reference Library, Doubleday (available in St. Matthew Gift Shop).

ordained for the diocese celebrated their 25th anniversary, while several churches and a school celebrated milestone anniversaries; a mission church was rededicated and two parish halls were dedicated; two Catholic sections of cemeteries were blessed; diocesan priests celebrated the Mass in the extraordinary form for the first time; and the bishop launched a Web site to promote Catholics in the political arena.

Charlotte Bishop Peter J. Jugis, along with Raleigh Bishop Michael F. Burbidge, launched Catholic Voice NC, an initiative to give North Carolina's Catholics a greater voice in the political process.

The two bishops made the announcement during a press conference in front of the State Legislative Building in Raleigh July 2. The initiative's Web site, www.catholicvoicenc.org, facilitates contact between legislators and interested Catholics who register at the site.

"It is our belief that in a democracy, loving our neighbor and caring for the least among us means supporting leaders and policies that promote the common good and protect society's most vulnerable members," said Bishop Jugis to the reporters, news cameras and crowd of approximately 50 people.

Catholic Voice NC later surveyed local and other political candidates on issues relating to church social teaching, and results were posted on the site in October.

On June 7, Bishop Jugis ordained two men as priests — Father Brandon Jones and Father Tri Vinh Truong — during a Mass at St. Vincent de Paul Church in Charlotte.

"By your teaching, sanctifying and shepherding in the name of Christ, the Lord will work through your ministry to produce the fruit of salvation in the people you serve — the fruit which remains unto eternal life," Bishop Jugis told them during Mass.

In his journey to the priesthood, Benjamin Roberts was ordained a transitional deacon by Bishop Jugis at St. Patrick Cathedral in Charlotte March 29.

"It is as a servant that Benjamin will share in the mission and the grace of Christ," said Bishop Jugis.

In May, the first group of permanent deacons ordained for the Diocese of Charlotte celebrated their 25th anniversaries of ordination.

The 19 deacons were ordained to the permanent diaconate by then-Bishop Michael J. Begley before more than 2,000 people at Ovens Auditorium in Charlotte May 29, 1983.

"It was scary at first," said Deacon Andy Cilone, permanent deacon at Immaculate Conception Church in Forest City. "We referred to ourselves as the guinea pigs."

"It was a special group. We were like a fraternity. We looked out for one another," said Deacon Harold Markle, permanent deacon at St. John Baptiste de la Salle Church in North Wilkesboro.

Special anniversaries

On June 29, Sacred Heart Church in Salisbury celebrated the conclusion of the parish's 125th anniversary with a Mass in the Omwake-Dearborn Chapel of Catawba College.

Later that day, a commencement ceremony took place to mark the laying of the foundation for the building of the new Sacred Heart Church and school.

"Celebrating 125 years here in Salisbury is a true milestone for our parish because it reminds us that in this world that is forever changing, the eternal truths of Christ and his church remain steadfast," said Father John Putnam, pastor.

Parishioners and clergy gathered March 15 to celebrate the 60th anniversary of the dedication of St. Joseph Church in Asheboro. With its beginnings as a small group of Catholics meeting for Mass in the late 1940s, the parish today is a mixture of many cultures, including German, Polish, Asian, Hispanic and others.

"We look back to the past, which was wonderful, even as we look forward to a bright new future filled with first Communions, confirmations and marriages of parishioners who will celebrate the next 60 years," said Oblate Father Joseph Tustin, a former pastor who concelebrated the anniversary Mass.

On Sept. 27, Father Frank O'Rourke, pastor of St. Gabriel Church in Charlotte, celebrated a Mass to honor the 50th anniversary of St. Gabriel School.

The following celebration included a film highlighting the school's 50 years and an indoor picnic. Among the attendees and special guests were past administrators and teachers, and former pastors.

"The campus has changed, but the mission has not," said Father Edward Sheridan, a former pastor.

That mission, he said, is "to provide an environment where things can take place that really matter — to provide an environment where there is true Christian guidance for our children and our parents."

Faithfully dedicated

The week prior on Sept. 19, Bishop Jugis rededicated the refurbished St. Bernadette Mission in Linville. Father Christopher Gober, pastor, concelebrated with former pastors and other diocesan priests. The Mass was the culmination of more than a year's worth of work to expand and refurbish the church, a growing mission of St. Lucien Church in Spruce Pine.

St. Bernadette Mission was expanded to accommodate the large seasonal population it serves.

"We had to develop for the immediate need but for the future as well," said Father Gober. "The changes and beauty within the church are to inspire the people and draw them deeper into the sacred mysteries."

On July 27, Bishop Jugis dedicated the renovated parish hall at St. Joseph Church in Charlotte. The Charlotte-area Vietnamese Catholics raised funds and performed much of the manual labor to repair and expand the hall, which had been scorched by a kitchen fire in September 2006.

"The parish hall is an important center where we will gather for parish activities now and in the future, and Christ will be present there," said Bishop Jugis. "In the activities that take place in the parish hall, we will come to know the presence of Christ, and we will experience the joy of his friendship and grow in his love."

Earlier on Jan. 26, Bishop Jugis dedicated the new Family Life Center at St. Patrick Cathedral in Charlotte.

Hundreds of parishioners watched the ribbon cutting ceremony to officially open the center, which provides much-needed space for meetings, receptions, workshops and parish ministries — things the 1930s-era cathedral could not accommodate.

Bishop Jugis blessed the Catholic sections of a cemetery in Matthews Aug. 12 and in Huntersville Dec 2.

At Forest Lawn East Cemetery in Matthews, the section called The Garden of St. Matthew is the result of a collaborative effort between the cemetery and St. Matthew Church.

"This has been a long effort to bring this to fruition," said Msgr. John McSweeney, pastor of St. Matthew Church.

At Northlake Memorial Gardens cemetery in Huntersville, the Catholic section — which consists of two gardens, the Garden of the Holy Rosary and the Garden of All Saints — was a collaborative effort between the cemetery and St. Mark Church in Huntersville.

The Catholic sections are "a pastorally sensitive approach, offering equal access at one location to all our Catholic parishioners who desire a resting place for either the body or for cremated remains," said Bishop Jugis.

The bishop said the sections fulfill "the requirements of our (diocesan) policy on cemeteries adopted in 2007, which requires that a resting place for the bodies of the deceased and a resting place for cremated remains be available all at one location."

Plans are currently in the works for the opening of a Catholic section at Sharon Memorial Park and Crematory in Charlotte in 2009.

Extraordinary form

In December 2007, 14 priests from the diocese participated in a five-day training session on the 1962 Roman Missal to begin celebrating the extraordinary form of the Mass in their parishes.

The first was Father Eric Kowalski, pastor of Holy Angels Church in Mount Airy, who celebrated the Latin-language liturgy Jan. 5.

Another church in the diocese where the Mass in the extraordinary form is now offered is St. Joseph Church in Asheboro. For Father Christopher Davis, pastor, the Latin-language Mass was particularly appealing.

"It allows time for contemplative prayer," he said. "You really get that sense of reverential silence upon entering into the mystery of the Eucharist."

The Mass from the Roman Missal in use since 1970 remains the ordinary form of the Mass.

Thousands of people gathered for the diocese's fourth annual Eucharistic Congress at the Charlotte Convention Center Oct. 3-4.

The two-day event, themed "It Is Christ Whom We Proclaim," included a eucharistic procession through uptown Charlotte, eucharistic adoration, music and speakers.

"The Eucharistic Congress is an opportunity for the entire diocese to come together each year to celebrate our faith and our love for the eucharistic Lord," said Bishop Jugis.

"The Eucharist brings us together as one body in Christ. It is the source and the summit of our Christian life, as well as the heart of our Christian life," he said.

On March 1, Bishop Jugis received nine men as candidates to the permanent diaconate during a rite of candidacy at St. Patrick Cathedral.

"The Holy Spirit has been working in you, and now in this ceremony the love of Christ moves you to express openly your desire to be bound in Holy Orders for the service of God and humanity," said Bishop Jugis to the candidates.

On Feb. 2, two men — Brother Anthony Swofford and Brother Edward Mancuso — professed their solemn vows as Benedictine monks at Belmont Abbey. Accepting their vows and celebrating the Mass was Abbot Placid Solari.

By taking solemn vows of stability, obedience and commitment to a monastic manner of life, the two men will live the rest of their lives in the Benedictine community at Belmont Abbey.

Historic U.S. election foreshadowed by Catholic comic-book series

BY EILEEN CASEY
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

WASHINGTON — A Catholic comic-book writer, Berry Reece, was ahead of his time in 1964, predicting a model for a presidential candidate in the 1976 election.

Coming in a close second in the New Hampshire primaries and defeating Sen. Oilandgas in the debates, the candidate in the Treasure Chest comic-book series, "Pettigrew for President," exuded integrity, charisma and promised America a new hope for the future, though many of his adversaries said he lacked experience. Sound familiar?

New York Gov. Timothy Pettigrew was an African-American and a Catholic, and the dream of a black president was not achieved in 1976.

But 44 years after the series by Reece and cartoonist Joe Sinnott, it has become a reality in America, with the Nov. 4 election of Sen. Barack Obama.

President-elect Obama has striking similarities to Reece's Pettigrew; most notably, both were the first black candidates to receive the presidential nomination from a major political party.

However, those reading the comic-book series did not learn until the final installment that Pettigrew was African-American; Sinnott used shadows or placed the character behind scenery for most of the series.

Reece said Pettigrew's race was withheld until the conclusion, "so that his strength of character and words said would be just as possible as any other candidate, and so he wouldn't be judged on the basis of race."

"I was trying to conceive of a person, a hero, a protagonist, who could unite the allegedly United States of America. ... The best president I could imagine who could do that would be a serious thinker of the Afro-American race," Reece said.

Reece remarked that in putting the two candidates side by side, "any similarity would be coincidental. But Pettigrew is a man of serious, complex intellect and integrity, and a strong family man as a husband and father. Obama is all these things to the 15th power."

The question remained for Pettigrew, however, whether he would actually be elected president. In the final panel, Reece depended on the children reading the series to make the call.

"It would depend on whether they believed, and indeed lived those words in the declaration, 'all men are created equal,'" the panel said.

The series "Pettigrew for President" was distributed to students at Catholic parochial schools across the country through the Commission on American Citizenship Activities. The commission hoped to instill in students principles of American patriotism as well as Catholic ideology during a time of uncertainty in the United States, with racial disparity and communist fears at the fore.

The commission was based at The Catholic University of America in Washington, where today its documents, including the Reece-Sinnott Treasure Chest series, are in the archives.

In comparing the issues of 1964, what he thought Pettigrew would have had to handle, and the issues Obama faces in 2009, Reece sees similarities.

"In the sense that we are handling international problems in the Middle East that some serious scholars say might make ... World War III because of so much foreign dependence on oil, (and) the '50s and '60s (are) looked at as another time when we tried to prevent a great world war from happening — the war on communism," he said.

Before his book-publishing career, Reece left his home in the South to go to college at the University of Notre Dame in Indiana. He said there he experienced a total transformation: His religion, political science and law teachers changed his beliefs that had been influenced by his ancestors' culture of slavery, lynching and segregation.

"They made me understand that racism is America's biggest burden, and greatest sin. I had to be very circumspect, and put everything I had been taught before in my back pocket," he said.

Reece also spent time writing for United Press International during the civil rights movement.

"Those were interesting times," he said.

Having lived through such tumultuous moments in history, including the assassinations of John F. Kennedy, Rev. Martin Luther King Jr. and Robert Kennedy, Reece expressed optimism about the country's future.

"I think that the world is a better place in 2008. We should all have hope," he said.

Priests, others reveal Jesus' loving nature

BY JEFF HENSLEY
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

When the new pastor came into the parish, it was obvious he was a gentle, intellectual Franciscan — warm, with a respectful nature.

What didn't become apparent until he'd been there awhile was that he intended to be the pastor of the parish, not simply celebrate the sacraments and sit back and watch things happen.

And some of the groups within that particular parish had grown quite strong and independent under the previous administration.

In time, he began to make his impact on the ministries of the parish. True to Franciscan spirituality, there came to be more of an emphasis on social ministry.

Some of the other ministries sought to assert their "power" and found out, sooner rather than later, that the new pastor really was in charge of the parish.

He was "in charge" not in an authoritarian sense, but in the sense in which true authority holds the reins — with a gentle touch. He listened to all sides, he brought in new ideas and new ministries, and gradually almost everyone came to respect his leadership.

The Isaiah reading for this week describes the Lord's servant, in reality the coming Messiah, as, "not making his voice heard in the street. A bruised reed he shall not break, and a smoldering wick he shall not quench, until he establishes justice on the earth."

When I read it I couldn't keep from thinking about this gentle, warm and bright Franciscan.

The priesthood is intended to represent Jesus to the people of the church. When a priest does it well, though we know he is not Jesus in the flesh, we find ourselves wondering if God might applaud his efforts to show his Son to us by saying, as the voice from the heavens did when Jesus came out of the water after being baptized:

"You are my beloved son; with you I am well pleased."

Questions:

Have you known priests who "showed you" Jesus particularly well? How can you better reveal the loving nature of Jesus to those you come into contact with daily?

Scripture to be Illustrated:

"On coming up out of the water he saw the heavens being torn open and the Spirit, like a dove, descending upon him. And a voice came from the heavens: 'You are my beloved Son; with you I am well pleased'" (Mark 1:10-11).

'Bedtime Stories' is entertaining comedy

BY KATIE MOORE
STAFF WRITER

CHARLOTTE — Adam Sandler takes a turn toward family friendly in his latest adventure comedy "Bedtime Stories." Geared to the grade-school set, this film is reasonably entertaining and contains positive themes of perseverance and family unity.

Not to mention, it is relatively inoffensive, considering the crude antics its star is typically known for.

Skeeter Bronson (Sandler) is a run-of-the-mill hotel handyman who reluctantly agrees to watch his niece and nephew while his sister Wendy (Courteney Cox) goes out of town for a few days.

In an effort to entertain the kids, Skeeter reverts to a tactic that his father used when he was a child and tells them whimsical bedtime stories.

The tales, based on Skeeter's life, are set in imaginary backdrops — the Middle Ages, the Old West and outer space.

The plot thickens when it starts raining gumballs and Skeeter realizes that events from the stories are happening to him in real life.

From that point, Skeeter tries to tailor the stories to fit his own desires, hoping he can land himself a fancy new car, a long-awaited job promotion and a date with a hotel heiress.

What happens in the end is not exactly what Skeeter had in mind.

This film is primarily focused on Sandler's character and contains some

Pope says Vatican must be on Internet with word, sound, images

Camera operators film pope 'with passion and joy,' says priest

BY CINDY WOODEN
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

VATICAN CITY — The Vatican media must unite their efforts to provide packages of word, sound and images to proclaim the Gospel to modern Internet users, Pope Benedict XVI said.

"Today the Internet calls for a growing integration of written, audio and visual communications and therefore challenges the media at the service of the Holy See to enlarge and intensify their collaboration," the pope said Dec. 18 during a meeting with employees of the Vatican Television Center.

The meeting marked the 25th anniversary of the establishment of the center, which is responsible for filming papal events, making documentaries and providing them to Catholic and other television outlets.

Pope Benedict told the employees that, because the Catholic Church cannot allow its message to be outside "the spaces in which numerous young people navigate in search of answers and of meaning for their lives, you must seek ways to spread voices and images of hope in new formats."

The Vatican Television Center has a small staff and limited resources, but the pope asked the employees and members of the administrative council not to be intimidated; "many people, thanks to your work, can feel closer to the heart of the church," he said.

For centuries pilgrims having been coming to Rome each year to see the pope, he said, and "today this desire can be satisfied, at least in part, thanks to radio and television."

The advantage of providing audiovisual images of the pope to television networks around the world is that they reach an audience well beyond the Catholic faithful, he said.

The access gives billions of people "timely information about the life and teaching of the church in today's world at the service of the dignity of the human person, justice, dialogue and peace," the pope said.

Jesuit Father Federico Lombardi, who serves as director of the television center as well as of the Vatican press office and Vatican Radio, said almost every television image of the pope people around the world see is an image filmed by the Vatican Television Center.

"Even if they are watching RAI (in Italy), Bayerische Rundfunk (in Germany) or CNN, we are the origin in almost every case," Father Lombardi said.

Father Lombardi thanked the pope for his graciousness in allowing the Vatican camera operators to shadow his every public move, but he said that being there with the camera rolling "is our job. It is our obligation. We do it with passion and joy."

Pope Benedict said much of the work of the television center involves filming and distributing images from liturgical celebrations at the Vatican.

"The liturgy truly is the summit of the life of the church, a time and place for a deep relationship with God," he said.

Filming the ceremonies requires not only professional expertise, but also a "spiritual harmony" with what is being filmed and with the devotion or desire for the spiritual nourishment of the audience, the pope said.

Sunday Mass at Notre Dame's basilica now televised live by CatholicTV

NOTRE DAME, Ind. (CNS) — Sunday Mass celebrated in the University of Notre Dame's Basilica of the Sacred Heart at 10 a.m. Eastern time is now being televised live weekly on CatholicTV, a television ministry of the Archdiocese of Boston.

"We are pleased to partner with CatholicTV to provide the Basilica Mass each Sunday morning," said Holy Cross Father Richard Warner, campus ministry director.

"CatholicTV has strong East Coast distribution and a strategy for growing its cable audience on a nationwide scale. We are firmly committed to bringing quality Catholic liturgies to a national and global audience," he said in a statement.

CatholicTV, formerly Boston Catholic Television, can be found on Comcast, Verizon, Full Channel and RCN cable providers in New England. It also can be viewed nationally on Sky Angel IPTV, which is Internet protocol television that uses a broadband connection.

The Web site www.skyangel.com specializes in Christian and family-friendly television and radio programming.

The Mass from Notre Dame is also streamed live and archived online at www.CatholicTV.com.

The Mass was broadcast on the Hallmark Channel on cable from 2002 to June 2008 and also on DIRECTV in 2007.

Since June, according to a news release, the basilica staff has received thousands of letters and messages urging that the Mass continue to be available on television. Many viewers are housebound or otherwise unable to attend Mass at their local parish.

Information on the Basilica of the Sacred Heart — including instructions for downloading the Mass on the Internet, viewing liturgical readings and music texts online, and taking a virtual tour of the basilica — is available on the Web at <http://basilica.nd.edu>.

CHRISTMAS REVISITED

Students, volunteers help families at Christmas

Metro School, a Charlotte Mecklenburg School which serves significantly cognitively-disabled students between the ages of 5 and 22.

"It started with two families from Metro School," said Bowler, who decided to make the project an annual event.

"Each year more and more people get involved," he said.

This year Bowler estimated that he had somewhere between 150 and 200 volunteers.

The project serves approximately 300 families who are recommended by schools and charitable organizations in the Charlotte area.

Each family receives two bags of food along with clothing for each family member and toys for the children.

Over the years, Bowler has built up a volunteer partnership with Charlotte Catholic High School.

It began with students volunteering at Bowler's Camp SOAR, a Special Olympics Athletic Retreat for people with disabilities.

This year the students from Charlotte Catholic played an integral role in Operation Santa's Helpers, particularly with the distribution at Double Oaks Pre-Kindergarten and Family Resource Center.

For the past five years, Bowler has been working closely with the center, located in the heart of Double Oaks Community, a low-income neighborhood in north central Charlotte with a high percentage of households headed by single females with low education levels.

The students came to the center Dec. 19 to deliver the goods to the families.

"The Charlotte Catholic community has been unbelievable in getting behind this," said Al Tinson, media relations volunteer for Special Olympics Mecklenburg County and a parishioner of St. John Neumann Church in Charlotte.

"As a club, our foundation is based on service and giving back to the community," said Catherine Butler, president of the Fellowship of Christian Athletes at Charlotte Catholic High School, who headed the student-volunteer effort.

"At school we do a lot of service projects," said Butler, but being able to interact with the families makes "it a whole different experience."

Bowler feels particularly strongly about getting young people involved.

"I think it builds character and hopefully makes them better people," he said.

"They all seem to enjoy it and have fun and it gives the families an opportunity to have a Merry Christmas," he added.

The parish youth group, Columbian Squires and Knights of Columbus Council 7343 from St. John Neumann Church in Charlotte also were instrumental in collecting donated items for the operation.

Bowler said he tries to get as many people involved as he can.

"It teaches us all what life's about," he said.

A law to help lives

New anti-trafficking act raises awareness of church teaching, plight of many

Not all presidential law signings make the headlines, but some should make news for the good that can come from good bills becoming good laws.

President George W. Bush signed legislation into law Dec. 23 that allows for greater coordination between federal, state and local law enforcement to prevent human trafficking and to prosecute those involved in human trafficking.

According to information provided by the U.S. bishops' Migration and Refugee Services, the new law — the William Wilberforce Trafficking Victims Protection Reauthorization Act — will extend services and benefits to a greater number of trafficking victims who urgently need them.

Some benefits, for instance, will now be available immediately for trafficking victims who have a pending application for a visa. Also, children believed to have experienced a form of trafficking will receive 120 days of interim assistance while their cases are reviewed.

Other benefits will aid vulnerable children who are at risk of being trafficked, and make more children eligible for permanent legal status and the benefits of the refugee program.

The program also will require that children in the anti-trafficking program be placed in the least restrictive settings and receive home study before they are released.

It also will provide protections for children who are not admitted to the United States and are returned to their home countries.

The protections will help keep the children from being placed in the care of people fraudulently claiming to be parents or relatives in attempts to exploit them.

Salt Lake City Bishop John C. Wester, chairman of the U.S. bishops' migration committee, said in a statement that President George W. Bush had "done much to elevate public awareness about human trafficking and should be thanked for his leadership."

"It will be important, however, that the new administration and new Congress remain vigilant and continue to work to end to this abominable practice," he added.

National Migration Week, celebrated Jan. 4-10, was developed by the Migration and Refugee Services to promote study and discussion of issues such as comprehensive immigration reform, refugee rights and protections, and human trafficking within the framework of the Catholic Church's social teaching doctrine.

Being nice to the new kid

Why National Migration Week matters to your family

Globally, nationally and regionally, migration includes a host of complicated economic, political and pastoral issues. But what your children need to know can be summed up in six short words: Be nice to the new kid.

"New kid" is something your children can understand, especially if they've ever been one. Then they know how hard that is, particularly if your family had to move in the middle of a school year.

Everyone else seems to know "everything." Everyone else seems to know "everyone else." Everyone else seems to be very aware that you know little about your new surroundings, that you know no one.

And for the child who has just moved, there's missing old friends. There's getting used to a new teacher. There's trying to remember classmates' names.

Then, too, there's stress at home because, even under the best of circumstances, moving is tough on a family. Under less than ideal circumstances, it's tougher still, and settling in takes more time.

National Migration Week is a good reminder for children, parents and parishes that a small act of kindness — a smiling face, a friendly greeting — can make a world of difference for a "new kid," no matter how old he or she is.

The U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops' Committee on Migration has chosen "A Journey of Peace and Hope" as the theme for this year's National Migration Week, Jan. 4-10. There's a lot of great information at the committee's Web site, www.usccb.org/mrs/nmw/bishopsletters.shtml.

And a few quotes from attendees of the September 2004 international conference on "Migration and Theology," held at the University of Notre Dame in South Bend, Ind., sum up the importance of welcoming the stranger.

mission in Switzerland and a member of several migration commissions: "Within the church, no one is a foreigner."

Passionist Father Donald Senior, a biblical scholar and president of the Catholic Theological Union in Chicago: "The welcoming of strangers goes to the very heart of the Gospel message."

Cardinal Oscar Rodriguez Maradiaga of Tegucigalpa, Honduras: "We can't continue with the xenophobia that is growing everywhere. ... We are brothers and sisters."

Let us end with a prayer for migrants. (In 2005, the Missionary Sisters of the Sacred Heart of Jesus, founded by St. Frances Xavier Cabrini, celebrated the order's 125th anniversary.)

"Mother Cabrini, you came to America as a migrant, sent to care for those who had journeyed far from home. We ask you to teach us to welcome newcomers to our land and to serve them with the same joy you embodied.

"Beg Jesus, on our behalf, to give us the same gifts of faith, hope and love that he brought to perfection in you.

"We seek faith, that our trust in God will strengthen us to carry on the works of peace and justice. We seek hope, that our confidence will shine as a beacon to those who flee to our land in despair.

Seeing Jesus in a smile

Christmas Mass reveals Lord's presence in others

At Christmas we are reminded that Jesus is everywhere. We know that in the celebration of the Mass, Jesus is present in the Eucharist and that when we partake in holy Communion, Jesus becomes present in us.

The challenge in today's world, however, is opening our eyes to see Jesus in others.

This Christmas I was blessed with an invitation to the Holy Angel's Christmas Mass at Cardinal Gibbons Memorial Chapel at Sacred Heart Convent in Belmont Dec. 23.

Holy Angels provides a permanent home for children and adults with mental retardation and physical disabilities, many of whom are medically fragile.

The Mass is an annual event during which residents from Holy Angels participate in a Nativity re-enactment.

When I received the invitation to the Mass, I knew it was going to be a touching experience. However, the joy I witnessed there was beyond anything I could have imagined.

I don't consider myself an overly-emotional person. But as I tried to convey my experience to my mother while standing in her kitchen on Christmas Eve, the flood gates opened and I started to cry.

I told her about the residents and their exuberant participation in the re-enactment through song, dance and theatrical performance.

Some Moore Thoughts

And I told her of one resident Robert, who assisted as an altar server during the Mass.

For the nearly 20 years, Father Frank O'Rourke, pastor of St. Gabriel Church in Charlotte, has celebrated the Christmas Mass for Holy Angels. And for the past 15 years, Robert has been right by his side.

The look of pride on Robert's face as he assisted during the Mass was manifested in the form of a beaming smile.

Robert sat by Father O'Rourke during the Nativity re-enactment and as I glanced over at the pair, I caught Robert reaching out to shake Father's hand.

His esteem for Father O'Rourke was truly heartwarming.

During the sign of peace, I too got to shake Robert's hand.

After that, I was the one who was beaming.

The next day, as I sat in a pew at St. Patrick Cathedral waiting for Christmas Eve Mass to begin, I read an Advent reflection by Bishop Robert Morneau. As he said, "We are to be watchful as the Lord appears to us through the course of our ordinary lives."

I knew that I had been truly blessed because Jesus had revealed himself to me in such an obvious way — through Robert and his great big smile.

Jesus is not always easy to spot, but he is always there.

It is up to us to keep our eyes open Making Jesus the centerpiece of your new year

Cardinal Newman offers inspiring prayer about depending on God

If you are thinking about making some New Year's resolutions, here's a good tip: Make Jesus the centerpiece of our good intentions.

Cardinal John Henry Newman did this so beautifully.

Cardinal Newman was born in England in 1801 and became an Episcopal priest in 1825. He led the Oxford movement, which emphasized the Fathers of the Church as a source of spiritual truth.

His sermons were controversial because he preached against the Protestant rejection of tradition.

In 1841, he began doubting the claims of the Anglican Church, and eventually resigned his post at St. Mary's Parish in the village of Littlemore, England.

On Oct. 9, 1845, he was received into the Roman Catholic Church, believing that his union with Jesus gave him the strength to make this courageous move.

One of his main contributions was in the field of psychological analysis, rather than in theology itself. He saw doctrine as a living thing and compared it to the idea of human development.

It's important to see him in the context of his devotion to Jesus.

He believed that the incarnation, God becoming man, was the central truth of Christianity and saw Jesus as the source of all spiritual power.

He died in 1890 and is no doubt a saint in heaven today. Cardinal Newman wrote the following prayer, which is a beautiful expression of his total dependence on the Lord. Perhaps it will inspire in you some New Year's resolutions, as it did in me:

"Teach me Lord to be sweet and gentle in the events of life, in disappointments, in the thoughtlessness of others, in the insincerity of those I trusted, in the unfaithfulness of those on whom I relied.

"Let me put myself aside, to think of the happiness of others, to hide my little pains and heartaches, so that I may be the only one to suffer from them.

"Teach me to profit by the suffering that comes across my path; let me use it that it may mellow me, not harden and embitter me, that it may make me patient, not irritable, that it may make me broad in my forgiveness, not narrow, haughty or overbearing.

"May no one be less good for having come within my influence; no one less pure, less true, less kind, less noble for having been a fellow traveler in our journey toward eternal life.

"As I go my rounds from one distraction to another, let me whisper, from time to time, a word of love to you. May my life be lived in the supernatural, full of power for good, and strong in its purpose of sanctity.

"Dear Jesus, help me to spread your fragrance everywhere: Flood my soul with your spirit and life.

"Penetrate and possess my whole being so completely that my life may be only a radiance of yours.

"Shine through me and be so in me that every soul I come in contact with may feel your presence in my soul.

"Let them look up and see me no longer, but only Jesus."

HAPPY VOICES WILL HELP FIGHT FEARS IN 2009

During a public broadcasting program on the late Luciano Pavarotti, a renowned opera singer was asked, "What made Pavarotti's voice so awesome?"

"He had a happy voice!" the opera singer replied.

After the interview, the program played selections from Pavarotti's performances. As I listened, I too agreed that his voice was ever so cheerful, jumping with joy.

His words and singing exuded gusto and happiness. The tenor also caressed them with the smile of a mother caressing her newborn child. It was as if love was pouring out from his whole being.

To appreciate a happy voice, all we need is to experience the opposite.

When we are angry we tend to stiffen our voice. When we don't want to reveal our self to another we tend to flatten it. And when we are down our voice can sink to muttering.

A happy voice is a gift. It is in the nature of some people to possess a joyful voice that rings with vitality. But no one can maintain a happy voice forever. We all become down at one time or other, and so does our voice.

Still, a happy voice is worth cultivating. One way to accomplish this is to foster a deep appreciation for life, to drink in the goodness and beauty around us, to count our blessings.

My grandfather used to do this frequently when he was alive. After a wonderful meal, he always took time to thank God out loud. How frequently I would hear him whisper, "Thank you, God!"

Another means for cultivating a happy voice is to take an account of how much bounce it possesses from time to time. If it is flat or tense, why is this?

Monitoring our voice implies working at overcoming whatever may be sapping its life continuously.

Political and economic experts are predicting 2009 will be bleak. Fears of all types are in the air. When in a fearful state we tighten up, and so does our voice.

One New Year's resolution we must try to practice above all others is to keep our voice happy.

The reason people loved Luciano Pavarotti was his ability to communicate the innate joy with which he was blessed. As he made beautiful music, so too must we do the same with our voices.

Beautiful music not only touches the heart, but moves it. Our voice, when happy, contains the greatest power we can possess for fighting against fear and the dire predictions for 2009.

A call to fight for peace

The pope's 2009 World Day of Peace message

In his Jan. 1, 2009, World Day of Peace message, Pope Benedict XVI writes that in order to build peace, we must be willing to fight!

But who must we fight?

The pope mentions no one.

Then what must we fight?

To that he answers "poverty"!

Pope Benedict's peace message, titled "Fighting Poverty to Build Peace," refers to Pope John Paul II's 1993 World Day of Peace message, which warned that poverty is often a contributing factor in armed conflicts, and that these conflicts feed poverty.

It's a vicious cycle.

Quoting his beloved predecessor, Pope Benedict writes: "The gap between rich and poor has become more marked, even in the most economically developed nations. This is a problem that the conscience of humanity cannot ignore."

But many in the developed world have smothered their individual and collective consciences with consumerism, materialism, nationalism and apathy. Perhaps this is part of what Pope Benedict means when he refers to "moral underdevelopment."

After all, how is it possible for morally developed nations and individuals to ignore countless fellow human beings who suffer the debilitating effects of malnutrition, preventable diseases, dirty water and dwellings not fit for animals?

Pope Benedict's peace message draws special attention to child poverty. With approximately 26,000 innocent children worldwide dying every day from hunger and preventable diseases, it makes compelling sense for the pope to urge us to "take the side of children" by giving priority to their basic needs.

Why can't the federal government, which continues to spend hundreds of billions of dollars for corporate bailouts, give even a fraction of that amount to bail out the world's desperately poor children?

Could it have anything to do with the fact that most citizens — even most Christians — remain silent regarding child poverty?

An area "needing particular attention from the moral standpoint is the relationship between disarmament and development," the pope said.

"The current level of world military expenditure gives cause for concern. ... Immense military expenditure, involving material and human resources and arms, is in fact diverted from ... the poorest who are most in need of aid," he said.

Pope Benedict warns that spending immense sums of money on the military "risks accelerating the arms race, producing pockets of underdevelopment and desperation, so that it can paradoxically become a cause of instability, tension and conflict."

Here the pope is turning that popular pro-military spending slogan "peace through strength" on its illogical and immoral head. According to Pope Benedict, large militaries and weapons development breed conflict, not peace.

Quoting Pope John Paul II, Benedict writes, "The poor ask for the right to share in enjoying material goods and to make good use of their capacity for work, thus creating a world that is more just and prosperous for all."

As the new year unfolds, let's resolve to pray and work harder than ever to create a more just world where all of God's children prosper and peace reigns!

Battle in a 'blind alley'

Pope deplores escalating violence in Gaza

BY JOHN THAVIS
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

VATICAN CITY — Pope Benedict XVI deplored the latest escalation of violence in Gaza, following Israeli airstrikes that left nearly 370 people dead.

Addressing pilgrims at his noon blessing at the Vatican Dec. 28, the pope urged serious dialogue between Israelis and Palestinians as the only way out of the "perverse logic of conflict and violence."

He called for a restoration of the truce in Gaza, and said the international community has a particular responsibility to leave nothing untried in helping both sides out of the current "blind alley."

"I am deeply saddened for the dead, the wounded, the material damage, and the sufferings and tears of the people who are the victims of this tragic sequence of attacks and reprisals," the pope said.

"The earthly homeland of Jesus cannot continue to be a witness to such bloodshed, which is repeated without end! I implore the end of this violence, which must be condemned in all its forms, and a restoration of the truce in the Gaza Strip," he said.

The pope called for a fresh demonstration of "humanity and wisdom in everyone who has responsibility in the situation."

His plea came after Israeli warplanes pounded targets in Gaza for three days, striking ministries and facilities of Hamas, the Palestinian paramilitary organization that runs the Gaza Strip.

In addition to the dead, officials said at least 600 people were wounded, stretching the territory's medical facilities to the breaking point.

Israel staged the attacks in reprisal for recent rocket attacks from Gaza into Israeli territory.

Last year, Israel instituted a closure of Gaza following an escalation of Palestinian missile attacks into Israeli border towns. The closure has plunged Gaza into an economic crisis, hindering basic social services and fueling a growing sense of frustration among the population.

Pope Benedict hopes to visit the Holy Land next May, and Israeli and Vatican officials recently began planning for the papal program there.

But Vatican sources have said a worsening of the Palestinian-Israeli conflict could alter the pope's travel plans.

The Vatican spokesman, Jesuit Father Federico Lombardi, told Vatican Radio Dec. 27 that the latest escalation of violence was a provocation by both sides, and showed that both Hamas and Israel were caught up in a mentality of conflict.

"Hamas is a prisoner of a logic of hatred, Israel of a logic of trusting in force as the best response to hatred. The need to keep looking for a different way out, even if it seems impossible," Father Lombardi said.

The spokesman said Israel's attack on Gaza was notable for its intensity and the number of victims.

"Certainly it will be a very hard blow for Hamas. At the same time, it is quite probable that there will be innocent victims, in fact many of them; hatred will increase and the hopes for peace will once again fade," he said.

IN A SAINT'S FOOTSTEPS

Cousins Ashley Vermillion and Jena Thralls stand by a marker on campus at St. Mary-of-the-Woods College, outside Terre Haute, Ind. The rock memorializes the time in 1840 when St. Mother Theodore Guerin ended a three-month journey from France and arrived in the Indiana wilderness, where she was given shelter by the ancestors of freshmen Vermillion and Thralls.

St. Mary-of-the-Woods freshmen tied to St. Mother Theodore Guerin

ST. MARY-OF-THE-WOODS, Ind. (CNS) — For cousins Jena Thralls and Ashley Vermillion, it's just a short walk from their college dorm room to the site of their family's special place in American Catholic history.

At night on the campus of St. Mary-of-the-Woods College, Thralls and Vermillion sometimes walk to the rock that memorializes a historic October moment 168 years ago, when St. Mother Theodore Guerin ended a three-month journey from France and arrived in the Indiana wilderness in 1840 with a dream to open an academy for girls.

The two college freshmen at times have imagined what it must have been like for Mother Theodore and the five other Sisters of Providence who traveled with her. Even more, the 18-year-old cousins have tried to imagine what it was like for their great-great-great-grandparents as they welcomed into their home the woman who in 2006 would become an American saint.

"If I could time-travel, I'd go back to that time," said Thralls, as Vermillion nodded in agreement.

Both are thrilled to have earned scholarships to St. Mary-of-the-Woods and continue the story that connects the saint and the Thralls family.

Since they were small children, the cousins have heard their grandfather's stories about the connection.

They know Mother Theodore was stunned when she finally reached her isolated destination in the deep western Indiana forest, a reaction she captured in her journal: "To our utter amazement, there was nothing in sight, not even a house. We went down a deep ravine and up on the other side, and through the trees we could see a farmhouse."

Thralls and Vermillion also know that the farmhouse belonged to their ancestors, Joseph and Sarah Thralls, the parents of 13 children. The Thralls family welcomed the sisters into their small, primitive home, letting them use half of its rooms.

The sisters and the family shared the home until the Diocese of Vincennes, Ind., eventually purchased the Thralls property for the Sisters of Providence.

The connection with the Thralls family is still celebrated by the order.

"We will owe the Thralls family forever for what they did," said Providence Sister Barbara Doherty, director of the shrine dedicated to St. Mother Theodore on the grounds of the college.

"The attachment between the Thralls family and the Sisters of Providence is gigantic. It's a wonderful thing that (Ashley and Jena) are here," she said.

Vermillion and Thralls have tried to follow Mother Theodore's example in sharing their blessings. They are committed to community service, especially helping families in need and children in hospitals.

There's one other connection that ties the cousins to the saint. St. Mother Theodore made educating others her life's mission. Vermillion hopes to become an elementary school teacher while Thralls is considering becoming an English teacher.

After 168 years the connection between the saint and the family remains strong.

"I always think about her when I'm having struggles," Vermillion said. "She went through a lot. I think about her strength and that helps me be strong."

"It's really important to me, knowing that our family helped a saint," she added. "Not many people can say that."

More than two dozen U.S. bishops could retire for age reasons in 2009

WASHINGTON(CNS)—Following the Jan. 5 retirements of 78-year-old Cardinal Adam J. Maida of Detroit and Bishop John J. McRaith of Owensboro, Ky., up to 27 more U.S. bishops, including three cardinals, could retire because of age this year.

There are 16 active U.S. bishops, including three cardinals, who have already turned 75. Eleven more will celebrate their 75th birthday in 2009.

At age 75 bishops are requested to submit their resignation to the pope.

Cardinal Bernard F. Law, archpriest of St. Mary Major Basilica in Rome and a cardinal since 1985, turned 75 Nov. 4, 2006.

He was archbishop of Boston from 1984 until his resignation from that post in 2002 in the wake of controversy over his handling of cases of clergy sex abuse there. He was named to his Rome post in 2004.

Cardinal Edward M. Egan of New York, whose 75th birthday was April 2, 2007, also celebrated 50 years as a priest that year.

He was made archbishop of New York in 2000 and a cardinal in 2001.

Cardinal J. Francis Stafford, who marked his 75th birthday July 26, 2007, has been the Vatican's major penitentiary since 2003.

He was president of the Pontifical Council for the Laity, 1996-2003, and became a cardinal in 1998.

Following a tradition begun by Pope John Paul II, Pope Benedict XVI often has asked cardinals to stay on the job after turning 75.

Even when a cardinal retires in his 70s, he remains an active member of the College of Cardinals, eligible to enter a conclave and vote for a new pope, until age 80.

There are 13 other active U.S. bishops who are already 75, and 11 more will turn 75 in 2009.

FROM THE VATICAN

Birth-control pill is linked to male infertility, says Vatican paper

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — The birth-control pill is causing “devastating” environmental damage and plays a role in rising male infertility rates, said the Vatican newspaper, L'Osservatore Romano.

“We have sufficient evidence to argue that one of the considerable factors contributing to male infertility in the West — with its ever decreasing numbers of spermatozoa in men — is environmental pollution caused by the byproducts of the pill” released in human waste, the article said.

Pedro Jose Maria Simon Castellvi, president of the Vatican-based World Federation of Catholic Medical Associations, wrote the article for the paper's Jan. 4 edition.

The pill has created “devastating ecological effects from tons of hormones being released into the environment for years,” the article said.

According to news reports, scientists worldwide have found sexual abnormalities in fish and other water-dwelling creatures that have been exposed to sewage contaminated with synthetic estrogens and other hormones like those used in the pill. Some European studies have blamed increased male infertility and poor reproductive health on environmental causes, especially estrogenlike chemicals found in pesticides, plastic food containers, shampoos, cosmetics and other products.

The article said that, with such clear evidence of the adverse impact the pill's use has on the environment, manufacturers should offer more information about the ecological effects of the use of these synthetic hormones. Much of the public is unaware that the contraceptive pill also acts as an abortifacient because it affects an embryo's ability to implant successfully, the article said.

Castellvi urged the Vatican to create a special commission dedicated to “Humanae Vitae” to better inform doctors about human fertility and about natural family planning.

Finance must serve ‘great slice’ of society, says Vatican’s UN nuncio

SAN FRANCISCO (CNS) — Put the reeling global economy on a moral footing and give more financial trust to those who are not rich and their faith-based allies, said the Vatican's representative to the United Nations.

“Finance is not a game,” Archbishop Celestino Migliore told Catholic San Francisco in a late-December interview. “Among some big and wealthy financial agencies, they just play finances as a game.”

“Really, finance works as long as it's put in the service of the common good and especially the great slice of our society which is composed of poor people or people who are not rich,” he said.

Rich nations must not respond to today's economic crisis by retrenching to protectionism but must play an ever stronger role in global development, Archbishop Migliore said.

Recounting his address to the Nov. 29-Dec. 2 U.N.-sponsored meeting on international development in Doha, Qatar, he said stronger nations must continue their aid commitments to support some 40 countries too weak to manage on their own.

The archbishop, who serves as the Vatican's nuncio and permanent observer to the United Nations, echoed Pope Benedict XVI's message for the World Day of Peace.

Pope Benedict said the role of finance in supporting long-term investment and therefore development appears “extremely fragile.” He said the crisis demonstrates “how financial activity can at times be completely turned on itself, lacking any long-term consideration of the common good.”

Archbishop Migliore said the Vatican's prescription for a sustainable and just global economy also includes such measures as small-scale business and farm loans to the poor.

One lesson of the economic crisis, he said, is that the poor turn out to be among the best debtors because they repay their debts. He suggested that developing nations rich in resources could tax their economic output, which would help them fund their own growth instead of relying on outside aid.

He also said greater trust and cooperation between governments and nongovernmental organizations, especially faith-based groups, would cut down on the “terrible bureaucratization” that can eat up a significant part of donors' money.

The archbishop also called for greater cooperation between well-funded aid groups and the church, despite ideological differences over such issues as homosexuality and condom use.

Church, chancery vandalized with graffiti

SAN FRANCISCO (CNS) — Most Holy Redeemer Church in San Francisco and the administrative offices of the Archdiocese of San Francisco were vandalized in early January with graffiti critical of the church's support of Proposition 8, the California voter initiative that overturned last May's state Supreme Court ruling declaring that all couples have the right to marry regardless of sexual orientation.

The San Francisco Police Department assigned the case to its hate crimes unit for investigation.

Chancery officials said guidelines by police for reporting and addressing such crimes were being forwarded to pastors and parish administrators.

Hibernians clean up grounds of historic Catholic church

MOUNT HOLLY — A group of Irish-Americans recently spent a day taking care of one of the oldest standing Catholic churches in North Carolina.

Members of the Ancient Order of Hibernians Sons of Erin Division in Mecklenburg County performed landscaping and other clean-up work on the grounds and cemetery of St. Joseph Church in Mount Holly Jan. 3. The effort was part of the Hibernians' bi-annual service project at the historic church.

"The AOH does this because it is our chance to give back to those who came before us," said Matt Crowley, project chairman. "I think it is in us as Irish-Catholics to give back, whether it be in volunteer work or in donations."

The Ancient Order of Hibernians, founded in New York in 1836, describes itself as the oldest lay Catholic organization in the United States. The Church of St. Joseph and Mary, known as St. Joseph Church since the Civil War, was built by Irish immigrant gold miners in the 1800s.

The small, white clapboard church accommodates about 100 people. It has no electricity, no bathroom; six large windows were used to light and heat the church.

A small room for a priest is located at the rear of the church; on the Spartan walls are 19th-century photographs showing Catholicism's roots in North Carolina at this tiny church.

After the Civil War, all but one of St. Joseph Church's families remained, and when Belmont Abbey opened nearby in 1876, area Catholics were relegated under the care of the Benedictine monks.

St. Joseph Church was mostly neglected over the years. A badly deteriorated roof offered little resistance to the elements, and only two shutters remained intact. In the early 1970s, the church was restored to its original splendor. The exterior, altar and pews regained their 19th century charm.

In 1979, the church was designated as a National Historical Site by the State of North Carolina and the U.S. Department of Interior. In October 1993, Msgr. John McSweeney, then-diocesan administrator, celebrated the sesquicentennial anniversary Mass of St. Joseph Church.

The continuing efforts of volunteers — Hibernians, Catholics and non-Catholics alike — have helped with the upkeep of the church.

"It is important that we pass on what was given to us. Hopefully we leave it better than we received it," said Crowley.

Pope: Financial crisis calls for new economic model

During the Mass in St. Peter's Basilica and reciting the Angelus afterward with people gathered in St. Peter's Square, Pope Benedict focused on the 2009 World Peace Day theme, "Fighting Poverty to Build Peace."

But he also called for an end to the "massive violence" in the Gaza Strip and offered special prayers for "the small, but fervent parish in Gaza."

"We place at the feet of Mary our concerns for the present and our fears for the future, but also our well-founded hope that with the wise and farsighted contributions of everyone it will not be impossible to listen to one another, meet together and give a concrete response to the widespread aspiration to live in peace, security and dignity," the pope said.

Pope Benedict prayed for peace throughout the Middle East, accepted the offertory gifts from a group of children from Lebanon and listened as a prayer was read in Arabic asking God to inspire people to combat poverty as a contribution to peacemaking.

Solidarity protects dignity

In his homily, the pope said he imagines Mary often asked herself: "Why did Jesus want to be born of a simple and humble young woman like me? And why did he want to come into the world in a stall and have those Bethlehem shepherds as his first visitors?"

After Jesus' death, he said, Mary understood that "God became poor for us, to enrich us with his poverty full of love, to exhort us to stop the insatiable greed that gives rise to fighting and division, to invite us to moderate our mania to possess and, in that way, to make us open to sharing and welcoming one another."

Poverty chosen as a way of life to demonstrate the primacy of God and of love for others is not the same thing as the kind of poverty experienced by millions of the world's people,

"There is a kind of poverty, an indigence, that God does not want and that must be fought."

— Pope Benedict XVI

Pope Benedict said.

"There is a kind of poverty, an indigence, that God does not want and that must be fought," he said, adding that it is "a poverty that impedes people and families from living according to their dignity, a poverty that offends justice and equality and, as such, threatens peaceful coexistence."

While AIDS and other diseases spread, while children live without basic necessities and millions of families struggle to find food, the pope said, "the unacceptable arms race" continues.

"On one hand, there are celebrations for the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, while on the other hand there is an increase in military spending in violation of the United Nations' charter, which commits nations to reduce them to a minimum," he said.

Solidarity, not a weapons system, is the key to protecting human dignity and ensuring peace, the pope said.

Challenge for the future

Turning to the current global economic crisis, the pope asked: "Are we ready to read it, in all its complexity, as a challenge for the future and not just as an emergency needing short-term responses?"

"Are we ready to conduct together a profound revision of the dominant model of development in order to correct it in a concerted and farsighted way?"

"Even more than the immediate financial difficulties, the ecological state of the planet and, especially, the cultural and moral crisis whose symptoms have long been evident in many parts of the world require it," he said.

The solution, Pope Benedict said, must be based on adopting a moderate lifestyle and making a commitment to living in solidarity with those whose dignity is threatened by poverty and by war.

Children bring up the eucharistic gifts as Pope Benedict XVI celebrates Mass for the feast of Mary Mother of God and World Peace Day Jan. 1 in St. Peter's Basilica at the Vatican.

Addressing pilgrims in St. Peter's Square after the Mass and greeting hundreds of people who had participated in a march for peace sponsored by the Rome-based Sant'Egidio Community, the pope said Christians are called to live with hope for the future.

"It is not a matter of trusting in better luck or in modern maneuvers of the market and of finance, but of each one of us making a commitment to being just a bit better and more responsible and to counting on the goodness of the Lord," he said.

Vatican takes part in star-studded celebrations

United Nations to coincide with the 400th anniversary of Galileo Galilei's first use of the telescope to observe the cosmos.

The Vatican also is celebrating the star-studded jubilee year, as the Vatican Museums, the Vatican Observatory and other Vatican offices participate in several special initiatives.

In late December, Pope Benedict XVI rang in the year of astronomy early by sending his greetings to those participating in the yearlong celebration.

The pope repeatedly has praised Galileo, calling him a man of faith who "saw nature as a book written by God."

The pope also has said the discoveries of science and astronomy can help people better appreciate the wonders of God's creation.

As part of the astronomy year, Vatican astronomer Jesuit Brother Guy Consolmagno is one of more than 50 scientists from around the world who is contributing to a new Cosmic Diary blog.

The U.S. Jesuit and other contributors reveal in the blog — www.cosmicdiary.org — what it's like to be an astronomer and explain details of their research.

The Vatican Observatory also will help organize a week on astrobiology at the Pontifical Academy of Sciences in November.

Astrobiology studies life in the universe and is hot on the hunt for extraterrestrial life and the so-called "Goldilocks planet." Like the porridge this childhood storybook character gobbles up, it's a theoretical planet that is not too hot and not too cold, but just the right distance from the sun to sustain life.

The observatory also is partnering with the Pontifical Commission for Vatican City State to publish a book on the history of astronomy and the Vatican.

In June a weeklong international symposium will cover the role of astronomy in the 21st century, science education and the dialogue that is needed between science and culture.

A special exhibit will open in October at the Vatican Museums displaying historical astronomical instruments. It will showcase antique instruments, spanning time from Galileo to models of the enormous telescopes used in astronomical research today.

Lastly, a large statue of Galileo is supposed to be erected somewhere on Vatican grounds. Paid for through private donations, the work of art was commissioned by the Pontifical Academy of Sciences to honor the 17th-century scientist. So far, there has been no word yet on when the statue will move into its new home.

Science and faith

Some church leaders expressed how the celebrations finally will put to rest the long suspicion that the church is hostile toward science.

"The church in some way recognized its mistakes" regarding Galileo.

— Jesuit Father José Funes

Only 16 years have passed since Pope John Paul II formally acknowledged that the church erred when it condemned the Italian astronomer for maintaining that the earth revolved around the sun.

Even though it happened some 400 years ago, "the dramatic clash of some churchmen with Galileo has left wounds that are still open," wrote Jesuit Father José Funes, director of the Vatican Observatory, in the Vatican newspaper L'Osservatore Romano.

He said the Galileo case may never be closed in a way that would make everyone happy.

"The church in some way recognized its mistakes" regarding Galileo but "perhaps it could have done better: One can always do better," he wrote, adding that he hoped the year would help smooth strained relations between faith and science.

One Vatican official recently proposed that Galileo would make "the ideal patron saint for dialogue between science and faith."

Culture, told Vatican Radio that Galileo, as a man of science and faith, showed the two were compatible as long as each operated within its specific field.

The good that came from the "dark shadow" of Galileo's condemnation was discovering theology should never, as it had during Galileo's time, use science to prove religious objectives especially in ways that hinder scientific study, he said.

But, he added, science also must not look down on theology as intellectually inferior — as if it were a kind of depository for a "Paleolithic intellect of the past."

The archbishop made the comments while he was participating in the culture council's congress on "Science 400 Years After Galileo Galilei." Cardinal Tarcisio Bertone, Vatican secretary of state, also participated in the November congress.

Cardinal Bertone said Galileo helped transform the nature of knowledge so that it would no longer be based on the certainties established by tradition, but on the truth derived from scientific experimentation.

However, he added, science must not completely divorce itself from moral traditions and laws that can help ensure that scientific developments remain ethical and at the true service of humanity.

Providing help. Creating hope. Changing lives.

Number of Catholics in Congress edging up years later there were 155 Catholics in the 110th Congress.

But the new group of senators and representatives has 162 members who identify themselves as Catholics.

With nearly all the 2008 electoral battles settled by early December, and the Senate seat of President-elect Barack Obama still not filled, the Catholic delegation included 17 Democrats and nine Republicans in the Senate and 98 Democrats and 38 Republicans in the House.

At the start of the 110th Congress in January 2007, there were 25 Catholic senators (16 Democrats and nine Republicans) and 130 Catholic House members (88 Democrats and 42 Republicans).

Two years earlier, the 109th Congress counted 24 Catholic senators (13 Democrats and 11 Republicans) and 129 Catholic House members (72 Democrats and 57 Republicans).

That's a far cry from the start of the 80th Congress in January 1947, when 11 senators and 67 House members were Catholic, according to an article by Jesuit Father Edward Dunn in the December 1948 issue of the American Catholic Sociological Review.

Only 26 of the 78 Catholic members of the 80th Congress were Republicans; one belonged to the American Labor Party of New York and the rest were Democrats.

"Catholics, then, make up 11.5 percent of the members of the Senate and 15.4 percent of the members of the House of Representatives," Father Dunn wrote. "This is not up to the ratio of Catholics in the total population, which is estimated at about 18 percent."

Musical chairs

Today the Center for Applied Research in the Apostolate, based at Georgetown University in Washington, estimates that Catholics make up 22 percent of the U.S. population.

But they are at least 26 percent of the Senate membership, depending on who fills Obama's seat, and more than 30 percent of the House membership.

The numbers are fluid, however, as members of Congress resign to take different posts and their seats are filled by others.

Vice President-elect Joseph Biden, for example, still officially represents Delaware in the Senate, although he plans to step down sometime before the Jan. 20 inauguration.

A Catholic, Biden is to be succeeded by one of his top political aides, Ted Kaufman, who was appointed to the post by Delaware Gov. Ruth Ann Minner and is also a Catholic.

Among the Catholics who will have to resign from the incoming Congress if confirmed for Cabinet positions are Sen. Ken Salazar of Colorado, whom Obama has said he will nominate as interior secretary, and Rep. Hilda Solis of California, the president-elect's choice as labor secretary.

Other Catholic Cabinet nominees not serving in the 111th Congress include former Senate Majority Leader Tom Daschle of South Dakota, Obama's pick as secretary of health and human services; former Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack, to be nominated as agriculture secretary; and Rep. Ray LaHood, a Republican who has represented Illinois in Congress since 1994 but who did not run for re-election in 2008.

Depending on who gets appointed to fill the vacated seats of those in Congress, the number of Catholics could remain the same or even increase.

For example, the person most widely discussed to succeed New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, a Methodist who is to be nominated as secretary of state in the Obama administration, is Caroline Kennedy, daughter of the nation's first Catholic president.

Another congressional seat needing to be filled will be that of Rep. Rahm Emanuel, Obama's White House chief of staff, who is Jewish.

Overall, the religious breakdown in Congress has remained relatively stable in recent years. After the 162 Catholics, the religious denominations with the most members in the 111th Congress are Baptists, with 64; Methodists, with 55; and Jews, with 45.

Forty-two members of the 111th Congress identify themselves as either Protestant or Christian, with no denomination named, while seven said they had no religious affiliation.

Other religious groupings with more than a dozen members in the incoming Congress include Presbyterians (43); Episcopalians (39); Lutherans (24); and Mormons (13). Eight members identify themselves as belonging to an Orthodox church.

Two members of the incoming Congress are Muslim and two are Buddhist. The remainder are divided among more than a dozen other Christian denominations.

Priest says Gaza 'drowning in blood'

the Holy Land attended the Mass at St. Stephen Church while local and international Christians gathered elsewhere in Israel and the West Bank to pray for a halt to the violence in Gaza.

When Israel began its military operation in Gaza in late December, the heads of Christian churches in the Holy Land called for Jan. 4 to be a day of prayer for peace.

At St. Stephen Church, retired Latin Patriarch Michel Sabbah of Jerusalem said the Israeli incursion into the Gaza Strip means death for both sides.

"What is happening now is death for Palestinians as well as Israelis," Patriarch Sabbah said at the Mass.

"What is happening in Gaza has made us all come to pray and join in a prayer that says stop the massacre. We are calling to God to look at Gaza and see what is happening there and to all of us," he said.

"Peace only can come through justice, not war, Patriarch Sabbah said.

"We are looking at ourselves and we are not doing our best. Israel should stop this and will stop, but then after this destruction there will be more destruction," he said.

He called on Palestinians to realize that the only way to regain their freedom and independence is through nonviolent means.

Earlier in the day at St. Catherine Church, adjacent to the Church of the Nativity in Bethlehem, West Bank, Christians attended a special Mass.

"This is genocide," said Bethlehem resident Adel Sahouri, 70, who attended the Mass.

"Israel is so strong and has all the weapons the world can afford. What does Hamas have? Just rockets, nothing," said Sahouri.

Israel launched a ground attack in Gaza Jan. 3 after several days of airstrikes to stop the Palestinian militant group Hamas from launching rockets into Israel. Since the start of the airstrikes

Dec. 27, at least four Israelis and more than 500 Palestinians, including 100 civilians, have been killed.

Israel says that during the past year Iranian-backed terrorist groups in Gaza have fired more than 3,000 rockets, missiles and mortars at civilian targets in the southern Negev region of Israel.

In a center pew of St. Catherine Church, Victor Zoughbi knelt in prayer.

He told Catholic News Service after Mass he was praying "not just for the people in Gaza but also for those in Tel Aviv. Every (Israeli) soldier going into Gaza now has a mother who is sitting glued to the television with her heart in her throat. He who truly has God in his heart loves everybody."

Zoughbi said he did not understand the purpose of Hamas' rockets, given their inaccuracy, and he emphasized the fact that there is only one Palestinian government headed by Palestinian Prime Minister Mahmoud Abbas.

In June 2007, Hamas split with Abbas' Fatah movement and took control of the Gaza Strip. Abbas' government still controls the West Bank.

"What are we fighting over — for a piece of land? Take the land. In the end the land will swallow us all," he said, noting that, given the situation, he was not able to speak so freely with many of his friends and acquaintances lest his loyalty be called into question.

After the Mass in Bethlehem more than 50 worshippers — carrying a flower wreath, placards calling for peace, a black mourning flag and a Palestinian flag — processed around Manger Square reciting Psalm 50, traditionally said at funerals.

A buzz began in some of the small groups gathered outside the church as a rumor circulated that Hamas had taken some Israeli soldiers hostage. Israel denied the claim, and the rumor later proved to be false.

"What is going on is war and I am praying to stop it. I am not waiting for people to hear (my prayer); I am waiting for God and, whatever God's plan is, we will follow," said Rosemarie Nasser, 55.

"No one understands that God has his own time. So many times in our lives God uses the bad for good," she said.

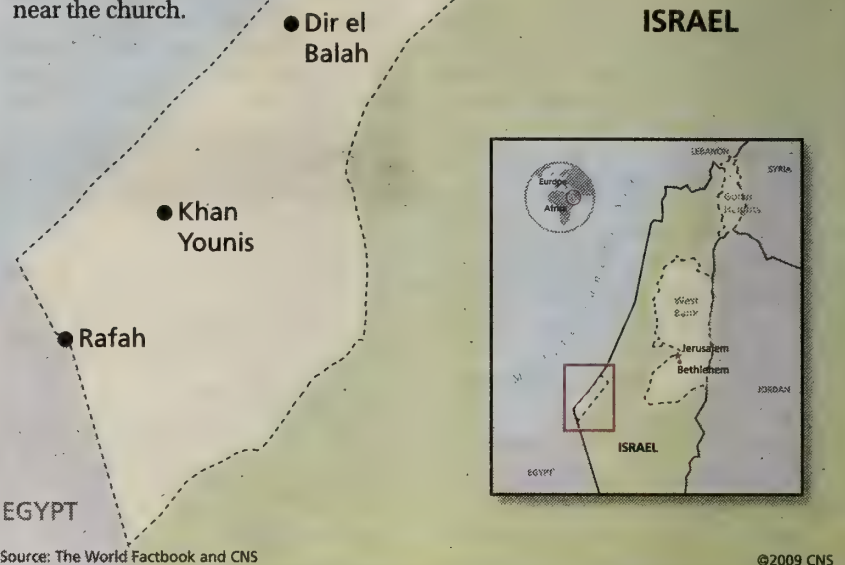

Gaza Strip

At about 25 miles in length, the strip covers an area twice the size of the District of Columbia.

Population: 1.5 million

Muslims make up more than 99 percent of the population.

There are a small number of Christians and one Catholic church, located in Gaza City. The Missionaries of Charity operate a home for disabled children and elderly women near the church.

Pope calls for Gaza peace talks, deplores violence in Congo

BY CAROL GLATZ
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

VATICAN CITY — As fighting continued in the Gaza Strip, Pope Benedict XVI urged Israelis and Palestinians to end the violent, armed clashes and start peace talks.

"Hatred and the rejection of dialogue bring nothing but war," he said after reciting the Angelus Jan. 6 with pilgrims gathered in St. Peter's Square.

"Today I would like to encourage the initiatives and efforts of all those who, having a heart of peace, are trying to help Israelis and Palestinians agree to sit down together and talk," he said.

He prayed God would help sustain the dedicated efforts of these "courageous builders of peace."

The pope also appealed for an end to the "inhumane brutality" unfolding in eastern Congo where some 20 children were abducted over the Christmas period by armed bandits who launched attacks against villages, leaving many people dead or injured.

Caritas Congo reported Dec. 29 that the children were abducted as child soldiers for the Lord's Resistance Army — a Ugandan rebel group. Caritas Congo is the local affiliate of the international Catholic umbrella group Caritas Internationalis.

Caritas said violence in the region flared in late December leaving hundreds of people dead. It said 50 bodies were found in the courtyard of a Catholic church in Doruma on Christmas morning.

The pope urged those responsible for such "inhumane brutality to give the (kidnapped) children back to their families" so that the future of these young people may be safe and fruitful.

The pope made the appeals on the feast of the Epiphany, which is a national holiday in Italy and is largely dedicated to children.

He said he was praying for the world's children, especially those experiencing a troubled childhood.

The violence against children worldwide "appears even more appalling considering that 2009 marks the 20th anniversary of the U.N. Convention on the Rights of the Child," he said.

He called on world leaders to renew their promises to defend, safeguard and foster the development of the world's children.

Pope Benedict noted that the Epiphany was dedicated to the Holy Childhood Association, a children-supported missionary organization that works in more than 100 countries. He thanked young people for their support of works that are designed to aid the world's needy.

Caritas Internationalis president calls for Gaza cease-fire

People dying due to lack of treatment

BY CINDY WOODEN
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

VATICAN CITY — Honduran Cardinal Oscar Rodriguez Maradiaga, president of Caritas Internationalis, called for an immediate cease-fire in the Gaza Strip to allow the wounded and their physicians to reach the region's hospitals.

"Caritas calls for action from the United States, the European Union and the international community to press for an immediate cease-fire to enable the sick and wounded to be treated," said the cardinal, the archbishop of Tegucigalpa, in a statement Jan. 5.

"War cannot be justified either by Israel or by Hamas," the Palestinian militant group that controls the Gaza Strip, the cardinal said.

Caritas Internationalis, the umbrella organization for 162 national Catholic charities, also called for the immediate opening of two more crossings into the Gaza Strip so that medical and other aid can reach the region's people.

The Caritas statement quoted Claudette Habesch, secretary-general of Caritas Jerusalem, as saying: "Our staff in Gaza are witnessing a collapse of medical services. People are dying in their homes because they can't get treatment."

Cardinal Rodriguez noted that more than 100 innocent civilians, including children, have been killed and thousands have been injured since Israel began its offensive in late December.

"Innocent people are suffering because aid agencies cannot reach them due to the Israeli military action," he said.

The Caritas statement said it was unsafe for people to move around in Gaza, meaning both doctors and the injured cannot reach the clinics and doctors cannot reach the homes of the injured.

Food, medicine and other relief items already were lacking because of the 18-month-long Israeli blockade of Gaza, Caritas said.

"War cannot be justified either by Israel or by Hamas."

— Cardinal Oscar Rodriguez

Caritas Internationalis is providing primary medical services through Caritas Jerusalem and Holy Family Parish in Gaza City, the statement said. A medical center and a series of aid stations remained operational, although with difficulty, but the mobile clinic has had to remain stationary.

Local staffers for the U.S. bishops' Catholic Relief Services, which works with the Caritas network, were among those unable to move around Gaza because of the Israeli incursion, said Matthew Davis, CRS country representative for Jerusalem, the West Bank and Gaza.

"The continued insecurity of the environment makes the coordination of aid distribution incredibly difficult," he said. "There is a need for a permanent and sustainable humanitarian space and a need for access to supplies and staff and the ability to distribute aid and make assessments."

Davis noted that Israel has not permitted humanitarian workers into Gaza since Nov. 4 because of what they deemed to be security issues.

"The Israeli ground invasion has turned everything upside down and made things even more complicated," he said. "It is going from bad to worse."

Author has firm grasp on shifting landscape of Catholic feminism

REVIEWED BY RACHELLE LINNER
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

With "Catholic and Feminist: The Surprising History of the American Catholic Feminist Movement," Mary J. Henold, a professor of history at Roanoke College in Salem, Va., has written an original and accessible narrative about 20 years of grass-roots efforts by Catholic feminists, both laywomen and women religious, to effect change in the American Catholic Church.

Henold, who is clearly sympathetic to the efforts of these women, has an impressive command of the complex, shifting landscape of organizations, individuals, and theological and political issues that were aspects of this decentralized movement.

"Catholic and Feminist" is clearly written and suitable for a general audience, but the inclusion of a 12-page bibliography of primary and secondary sources makes it a particularly rich resource for academic study. One of Henold's objectives is to "challenge the concept of Catholic feminism as an offshoot of secular feminism."

"Catholic feminists have unexpected origins that from the beginning mark them as substantially different from nonreligious feminists within the larger feminist movement. They are different because, in large part, Catholic feminism was not imported into the church; it grew organically within Catholicism."

Henold discusses mid-20th-century movements that "laid the groundwork for a critique of church power and control from a position of loyalty," including groups associated with the lay apostolate (the Catholic Worker, Friendship House, the Grail and the Christian Family Movement) and "new nuns" influenced by the Sister Formation Conference.

Most studies identify Catholic feminism with organized efforts around women's ordination, which began in the 1970s. Henold, however, contends that women's thinking began to change in the '60s, when "a small but growing number of educated laywomen and women religious ... provided the first counterpoint to the postwar American Catholic rhetoric of the 'eternal woman.'"

This was an ideology that promoted "an image of woman as pious, pure, submissive, domestic and confined to the private sphere."

"Exhortations to women to sacrifice their lives to the point of self-effacement were ubiquitous in American Catholic periodicals" and Henold shows how early feminists opposed this ideology and, in the words of the theologian Hilda Graef, began "demythologizing ourselves. Catholic feminists began at rock bottom, then, constructing new identities for Catholic women, establishing their existence as individuals with unique personalities, human imperfections and the right to self-determination."

Appropriately, therefore, one of the strengths of this book is Henold's succinct portraits of women religious, activists, theologians and writers. She identifies the personal influences on their intellectual journeys, their professional successes and failures, fruitful detours and disappointments.

The central contribution of "Catholic and Feminist" is Henold's clear explanation of the histories, rivalries and changing agendas of major feminist organizations, including the Deaconess Movement; the National Coalition of American Nuns; the Leadership Conference of Women Religious; the Women's Alliance for Theology, Ethics and Ritual; Chicago Catholic Women; the Women's Ordination Conference; and Women-Church.

Because of its fluid nature it is difficult to write a history of activism, but Henold does an admirable job analyzing changes in goals, ideological nuances, tensions between laywomen and women religious, strategic policy decisions, the challenges of racial minorities to a largely white movement, stances on women's ordination and the nature of ministry.

She pays close attention to efforts to legitimize women's groups on a diocesan level and attempts to dialogue with American bishops. A particularly interesting chapter discusses the importance of liturgy in Catholic feminism.

Liturgy was "a vital center of activism because Catholic feminists, being largely women of faith who named God as central to their existence, had a powerful need to define feminism as something holy."

Throughout the 1970s and 1980s, the women profiled in this book consistently refused to choose "between their loyalties to feminism and Catholicism." They had been inspired by the vision of renewal promised by the Second Vatican Council and understood their feminism as an expression of justice. By the end of the 1980s, however, many had "retreated to the margins or simply said goodbye to the institutional church."

In discussing a vigil held in response to the Vatican's 1977 "Declaration on the Question of the Admission of Women to the Ministerial Priesthood," Henold comments that, "for the organizers, rage and reconciliation were not inconsistent." This tension is the central theme of "Catholic and Feminist" and, more broadly, a metaphor for the book itself.

Henold has married her scholarship and training as a historian with her commitment to a "liberated Catholicism in which Catholic women understand that the unjust institutional power structure does not have the power to define them, or imprison them, or even reject them."

The result is a well-written analysis of an important aspect of contemporary American Catholicism.

Catholics must say 'yes' to serve God

BY JEAN DENTON
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

I haven't seen the current movie, "Yes Man," but I know from the ads what the story line is: A man with a fundamental attitude of reticence turns down every offer or invitation he ever gets.

But when he realizes this has caused him to miss a wealth of opportunities and experiences in life, he decides to make a radical change: to say "yes" to every possibility.

My friend Eric is that kind of yes man, saying yes to every request, every opportunity. He's also the kind of yes man that Samuel was in this week's first reading.

Eric said yes to the Lord's calling when he became a permanent deacon. Once ordained, he continued to say yes to every chance to be God's servant.

He and his wife have four children and an active family life while also maintaining a thriving dental practice. His friends and parishioners know he's admired by his patients, but we wonder just when he ever sees them.

Because it seems that he's always visiting a nursing home or hospital, teaching a class, working on multiple marriage cases for the diocesan tribunal or studying Scripture and the lives of the saints, or officiating at a funeral or counseling confirmation candidates.

He never turns down an opportunity to serve.

I've heard other friends say that Eric sleeps only two or three hours a night getting up at 4 a.m. to pray. That may be an exaggeration to describe his seemingly bottomless well of enthusiasm, but it is so Samuel-like that Eric would rise in the dark to hear his Lord speak to him — and to listen.

Knowing that, one realizes the source of his energy and commitment to constantly minister to God's people.

As a result, Eric is a model servant to his community. His positive yes-man speak-Lord-your-servant-is-listening attitude holds sway as he ministers with vigor and strength.

Consequently, like Samuel, the words he speaks are never "without effect" among those he serves.

When we hear God's voice, Eli tells us, we are to respond with openness and willingness to serve him. Such self-offering will allow God to work through us — and promises transformation.

Questions:

When was a recent occasion that you said yes to a specific opportunity to serve God? How did your openness to hear him speak through your action?

Boston religion TV game show proves popular

BOSTON (CNS) — The boosters of Boston religion TV game show think of as being styled after "Jeopardy!"

But in looking at the age of the contestants, it could well pass for an even younger version of "Are You Smarter than a Fifth Grader?"

The program in question is "Wow!" Sometimes it goes by its full name — Wow! The CatholicTV Challenge.

It has been produced for the past three years by CatholicTV, a television ministry of the Archdiocese of Boston founded more than 50 years ago.

In the half-hour show, three third-graders, usually from the same school, try to show off what they know about their Catholic faith.

Father Robert Reed, a Boston archdiocesan priest who is director of CatholicTV, devised "Wow!" and hosts. He also stands ready to fill in the gaps in the contestants' knowledge — and the answers as well — with details on the issue at hand.

"Feedback was excellent, especially from parents," said Chris Pham, a spokesman for the show, in an e-mail exchange with Catholic News Service.

"The show is clean, educational and, unlike most parentally approved shows, kids actually want to watch the show," he said.

Pham noted, "One parent called — she was also a religious education teacher — and asked if she could have the questions from the show so that she could use them for her class. She wanted to set up a little 'Wow!' show in her classroom."

The young contestants come to the studio with their teachers for a taping, generally all conducted over summer vacation.

"The teachers typically are smiling and laughing when they leave," Pham said. "They find it pleasing to show the kids that the faith can be fun and enjoyable."

He added, "The children tend to take the competition very seriously. They spend hours in preparation at their schools."

Father Reed himself has to write, on average, 70 questions plus answers and additional information for each show, which amounts to about 1,400 questions by the time a season's worth of shows is taped.

Each show has a theme, such as the sacraments, saints or another Catholic category. The theme is introduced by an animated dog — voiced by Father Reed.

Each show features three rounds of three students each. The winners of those rounds face off against each other in a final round.

Each show's winner gets prizes — typically, a set of DVDs.

About 50 installments of "Wow!" have been produced. Archived shows can be accessed online at www.catholicTV.org.

To catch the latest episodes, computer users can watch at the same time the Boston TV audience is watching: 6:30 p.m. Mondays, 8 a.m. and 4 p.m. Tuesdays, 10:30 a.m. and 8 p.m. Wednesdays, 1 a.m. and 4:30 p.m.

Thursdays, 1 p.m. Fridays, 8 p.m. and midnight Saturdays, and 9 a.m. Sundays.

In addition to "Wow!," CatholicTV's lineup includes other family-friendly and educational shows as well as religious and news programming, according to a news release.

Programs are available online anytime but also can be seen on cable in selected areas in the U.S. and Canada and via Sky Angel IPTV, which is Internet protocol television that uses a broadband connection.

Hindu filmmakers call St. Bernadette's message relevant today

PANAJI, India (CNS) — A recent film on St. Bernadette Soubirous shows how ordinary people can make a difference, said the film's producer and director, both Hindus from India.

V.R. Gopinath, who directed "Our Lady of Lourdes," said he made the movie because the saint's modest way of living, dedication to her ideals and faithfulness to her call are "important messages to the present society."

St. Bernadette first saw Mary in 1858 in Lourdes, in southern France.

The movie, which premiered Dec. 21, 2007 in Panaji, was shot in the southern state of Kerala. Ajna Noiseux, a 14-year-old girl of French origin living in Kerala, plays St. Bernadette.

"The movie shows that an ordinary person, without money, can make a difference in the world," said Kamalakhar Rao, the producer. "St. Bernadette's story is of selfless service."

Rao's visits to Lourdes and the encouragement of Archbishop Joji Marampudi of Hyderabad helped him complete the film.

At the 2008 French film festival on the occasion of the 150th anniversary of Mary's appearances to St. Bernadette, the film attracted rave reviews from the French media, particularly because it was made "by a Hindu," Rao said, adding the movie has "universal appeal."

St. Bernadette shunned the attention that followed the Marian visions. She entered religious life and remained hidden until she died in 1879.

ARCHIVAL ANECDOTA

For January and in honor of Catholic Schools Week Jan. 25-31, here is a look at the historic O'Donoghue School in Charlotte.

COURTESY PHOTO

O'Donoghue Hall circa 1908 is depicted in this post card published by International Post Card Company.

1830: At least two sources identify a small Catholic school operating in Charlotte around this time.

Located in the house of Father John Maginnis were a boys' school and a Catholic chapel. As with some apostolates during this time in North Carolina, the school was short-lived and there are no further details regarding its existence.

Sept. 6, 1887: Copious and verifiable records document the first Catholic school in Charlotte officially opening near St. Peter Church under the direction of the Sisters of Mercy.

The school, the Academy of the Immaculate Conception, began at the request of Father Mark Gross, pastor of St. Peter Church. By 1889, the institution was split into St. Mary's Seminary, a boarding school for girls, and a parochial day school.

Mercy Sister Catherine Price, sister of "Tar Heel Apostle" Thomas Price, was the first directress of the boarding school. The two schools had a combined student population of approximately 100 by the early 1890s.

1896: At this time, the Official Catholic Directory no longer lists the boarding school for girls; only the parochial school remains in operation.

1905: O'Donoghue Hall is constructed on the corner of Stonewall and Tryon streets through the generosity of Dr. Denis O'Donoghue. Designed by Benedictine Father Michael McInerney, a renowned architect and Belmont Abbey monk, this edifice becomes the new parochial school as well as St. Peter Church's parish hall.

The old school building, which opened in 1887, is converted into a convent for the Sisters of Mercy.

Unfortunately in 1921, a fire destroys the original school building.

Feb. 16, 1926: Benedictine Father Ambrose Gallagher, pastor of St. Peter Church, purchases property in Charlotte's Dilworth neighborhood for $21,000. The property is used as a new site for the parochial school. Enough property is obtained adjacent to the new school to provide room for a future convent and parish.

1930: A school building is constructed on the aforementioned site purchased by Father Gallagher. Benedictine Father McInerney designs the school building and it was named O'Donoghue School.

Sept. 1, 1939: Raleigh Bishop Eugene McGuinness consecrates St. Patrick Church on adjacent land to O'Donoghue School. The church is publicly dedicated Sept. 4 with a solemn pontifical high Mass celebrated by Abbot-Bishop Vincent Taylor of Belmont Abbey.

1943: U.S. soldiers stationed in Charlotte during WWII use the old O'Donoghue Hall on the corner of Stonewall and Tryon streets as sleeping quarters.

June 1944: St. Peter Church sells O'Donoghue Hall to the Elks Club for $50,000.

1946: After steadily adding high school grades, O'Donoghue School graduates its first high school class.

1955: The high school classes move to the new Charlotte Catholic High School on Park Road.

Oct. 29, 1959: The roof above the newly constructed O'Donoghue School auditorium collapses. No injuries result as the accident occurs at night.

1961: While male students remain at Charlotte Catholic High School on Park Road, female students move to the newly-established Our Lady of Mercy High School on the second floor of O'Donoghue School. Sisters of Mercy conduct classes there.

Enrollment of both high schools was around 150 students. The two schools merge again in 1968 and remain at the Park Road location until 1995, when Charlotte Catholic moves to an expanded location in south Charlotte.

1965: O'Donoghue School is renamed St. Patrick School. Sisters of Mercy staff the school continuously from 1887 until the 1990s.

parent Thomas, a senior wide receiver on the Winston-Salem State University Rams football team, calls on a student while visiting the kindergarten class at St. Leo the Great School in Winston-Salem Nov. 12, 2008.

During his visit, Thomas read a book, "Kick, Pass and Run," to the class of 20 kindergarten students; spoke about the importance of quality education, rest and exercise; and answered questions about football, Winston-Salem State University and college life in general.

Thomas, who also works at the Children's Museum in downtown Winston-Salem, said he makes it a priority to help out area children.

Third- and fourth-grade students are pictured with copies of the book, "Akimbo and the Elephants," at St. Patrick School in Charlotte Dec. 10, 2008. The 22 students were participants in a book club organized by parent Jacki Altmeyer. After reading the book, the students had a discussion on it and played animal tracking games relating to the story.

Eleven fourth- and fifth-graders met in the school library Dec. 11 to review the book, "Kensuke's Kingdom." After discussing the book, students painted shells in the style of one of the book's characters, sampled tropical foods from the book and took part in a nautical flag scavenger hunt.

ST. MARY CATHOLIC CHURCH
812 DUKE STREET, GREENSBORO

Join us as we remember Dr. King's life and his influence on others through "The Civil Rights Heritage Tour" of the Greensboro area. We'll also view the phenomenal photographs of historian Otis Hairston and hear the oral tribute to Dr. King by Delano Rackard.

Featuring The Civil Rights Heritage Tour -

On this unique African American tour, history comes alive through actors in period costume who depict Greensboro's rich civil rights past through the eyes of the people who lived it. The tour follows the city's unusual story of social activism from the early Quakers with their secret work on the Underground Railroad to the famous A & T Four who initiated the Woolworth's Sit-in Movement, the second most powerful civil rights movement in the nation. Participants will get to stretch their legs when they make two thirty-minute stops at the museum holding Greensboro's most extensive black history exhibit and at the Charlotte Hawkins Brown Historic site. A shorter stop will be made at Thea House, the Catholic Campus Ministry of the Diocese of Charlotte serving the Greensboro area. The tour, which includes visuals and tour guide narration, is both entertaining and educational for all ages. The motorcoach tour, consisting of 2 two-hour segments, will originate and terminate at St. Mary Catholic Church.

A prayer service, lunch and presentations by Otis Hairston and Delano Rackard will take place in the Parish Life Center of St. Mary Catholic Church during the mid-day.

Convergence against injustice

Three January observances intertwined with Gospel message

Each January, three observances converge that reinforce each other and summon the Christian world to work together against injustice.

Jan. 15 is the birthday of Rev. Martin Luther King, Jr., and on or around that day we observe a national holiday in his honor.

A week later, on Jan. 22, we recall the tragic decision made that day in 1973 by the Supreme Court in Roe vs. Wade, unleashing a policy of abortion on demand. On or around Jan. 22, large rallies and marches for life are held from coast to coast.

And from Jan. 18 to 25 each year, the Week of Prayer for Christian Unity is observed.

These three great movements are deeply intertwined.

Jesus Christ prayed that his followers would be one, as he and the Father are one. Authentic Christian unity does not mean pretending there are no serious doctrinal disagreements between denominations.

It does mean working to come to a deeper understanding of what those differences are and are not, as well as recognizing and building on the real unity that does exist in our common affirmation of Christ and his Lordship in our lives and in the world.

That affirmation of Christ requires we work to fight injustice. In his encyclical letter on Christian unity, issued in 1995, Pope John Paul II wrote:

"Many Christians from all communities, by reason of their faith, are jointly involved in bold projects aimed at changing the world by inculcating respect for the rights and needs of everyone, especially the poor, the lowly, and the defenseless ... Christians who once acted independently are now engaged together in the service of this cause, so that God's mercy may triumph."

Both the civil rights movement and the pro-life movement are evidence of this common engagement. Both movements seek to secure equal rights for marginalized human beings, despite their appearances, and to apply to law and culture the promises of the Gospel.

Both movements have found their "meeting place" and their "launching pad" in the churches, manifesting this declaration of Rev. King:

"I'm always happy to see a relevant ministry. It's alright to talk about 'long white robes over yonder,' in all of its symbolism. But ultimately people want some suits and dresses and shoes to wear down here.

"It's alright to talk about 'streets flowing with milk and honey,' but God has commanded us to be concerned about the slums down here, and his children who can't eat three square meals a day.

"It's alright to talk about the new Jerusalem, but one day, God's preacher must talk about the new New York, the new Atlanta, the new Philadelphia, the new Los Angeles, the new Memphis, Tennessee. This is what we have to do."

Defending the equal dignity of every human being after birth strengthens our witness to the rights of those in danger before birth, and vice-versa. The witness, in fact, is ultimately one: the witness to the one Christ, who restores dignity to every human life.

Father Pavone is national director of Priests for Life.

The bleak midwinter of post-holiday January

Month is soulful time of mystery, reflection

"In the bleak midwinter, frosty wind made moan ..."

Christina Rossetti opens her ode to the Christ Child with words that seem written for the cold, hard winter we are having in Anchorage, Alaska, where temperatures hover around zero and wind chills reach 30 below.

And although it may be warmer in other spots (and colder in Fairbanks, with nights near 50 below), this January midwinter, with its economic woes and war in Gaza, seems, in the words of another author, "the winter of our discontent."

The holiday season — bright, cheerful, even garish and gluttonous — gives way to the austerity of January, the bleakness of unrelenting winter.

"Earth stood hard as iron, water like a stone," writes Rossetti, who might have been looking out my winter window, where ice fog ascends each morning to leave trees thick with white hoarfrost.

It's an odd time, this January interlude. We celebrate Epiphany and Jesus' baptism, but we do so while taking the tree down and putting away the bright lights.

Nationally, we create a festival out of a football game, and we make resolutions we probably won't keep. As a church, we wait in "ordinary" time for Lent.

No wonder then, in the darkness of early January, as light trickles back to the Northern Hemisphere minute by precious minute, thoughts turn to questions of life and death.

The holidays bring death into sharper relief: the young female writer in my online writers' group succumbs with grace and faith to an illness that steals her from her young family. An older friend, a longtime newspaper man, faces his final Christmas.

Amacabre subject? Not to a Christian. It seems the bleak and frozen midwinter is a good time to contemplate it, a cocoon time to meditate on the seasons of life, the cycles of birth and death.

My meditations are partially induced by what I'm hunkering down with these January evenings, a Christmas gift, "This Republic of Suffering: Death and the American Civil War," a brilliant work by Drew Gilpin Faust.

Did you know that the 620,000 soldiers who died between 1861 and 1865 is nearly equal to the American dead in many other wars combined?

How did Americans absorb this orgy of death, this bloodbath on their own soil? What did it do to our ideas of how our loved ones should die, their unheard last words, the consolation they and the mourners would not experience at the deathbed?

How did it feel to see violent death photographed graphically for the first time on such a large scale?

It's a fascinating book, and it seems appropriate to read it in the "dead of winter" — what an apt phrase for this moment.

Christmas is a time of birth, springtime the time of resurrection.

But January, the bleak midwinter, January is time spent in the empty tomb. Not in a lonely or terrifying way but peacefully.

Someone has just been here, in the tomb, but he's elusive right now, even though he's very near.

January is a soulful time, a time of mystery and reflection, a slow down time.

It's a time to curl up with cocoa and read, to dream and pray and live in mystery. It's quiet time to draw close to him who holds the answer to the questions of life and, inevitably, death.

Rossetti's poem asks the famous question, "What shall I give him?" and answers in the quiet of midwinter, "Give me your heart."

Inspiration for hard times

When times look dismal, how do we avoid becoming overwhelmed? May I suggest seeking out sage quotes and taking them to heart?

Our best defense against fear is having good perception. When our world seems to be closing in on us, we tend to see only the negative.

Quotes broaden our perception, giving us hope, something to look forward to when we think we are sunk. Sage quotes contain the power of energizing you and making you feel "I can do it!" "I never thought of it that way" or "Let's try doing it differently!"

Short, inspirational quotes can be tucked in our mind and accompany us throughout the day, filling us with uplifting, positive thoughts.

Charles Kettering, inventor of the automobile starter, observes, "Where there is an open mind, there will always be a frontier." He reminds us to keep our minds open by continuing to read, consulting with knowledgeable persons and looking for new ways of energizing the mind.

Inventor Thomas Edison said,

"We've stumbled along for a while, trying to run a new civilization in old ways, but we've got to start to make this world over."

Edison's words encourage us to evaluate how we've done things, asking ourselves, "Shouldn't we be reassessing our old way of doing things in order to create new beginnings in our life. Could it be our tough times are blessing in disguise, calling for retooling, restructuring and renewal?"

Franklin D. Roosevelt wrote in the midst of the Great Depression, "The unhappy times call for ... plans ... to build from the bottom up and not from the top down, that put our faith once more in the forgotten man at the bottom of the economic pyramid." We are reminded to wait for help from the top, but to pick ourselves up by our own bootstraps.

Sage quotes containing wisdom are everywhere, waiting for us to find their inspiration.

We've been given a change to believe in Christians have responsibility to turn the world upside down

These first weeks of this new year are a strange time, an unusual time due to an extreme anticipation of that which we already possess.

It is the juxtaposition between the great event that truly made a difference — the Incarnation — and the event anticipated to make a difference, the inauguration of a new president of the United States.

The nation is awaiting "change you can believe in," anticipating as a change agent a president who must all but walk in water to meet expectations.

We have already been given a change to believe in, however.

It is ironic, as the spiritual significance of Christmas was all but diluted by the anxious advent for change in government.

A few years ago the pastor of our parish directed that the Christmas tree, rather than being placed in a stand in the sanctuary, be hung upside down from the rafter. The surprise — if not shock — of the parishioners entering church at Christmas became the theme of his homily.

"Father, why did you do that? It's upside down. It's out of place," he was told.

His response in the homily: The birth of Christ turned the world upside down, and the celebration of that fact should provoke an even greater reaction than a tree turned upside down.

Christians are agents of change with no need of civil or secular permission to fulfill that responsibility. To right the economy, to build a sense of community in a fractured nation can only be done by reversing the causes: greed, selfishness and violence.

That cannot be done by the president of the United States; it is something people must do themselves.

Christ is the one who brought change we can believe in. Now what is needed is change we can act upon with the courage to do what the change demands.

This courage to bring about the change we believe in requires being a sign of opposition to values of the world. The church cannot adapt the faith to make it palatable to modern tastes and expectations, what a Vatican official called an "accommodationist" approach.

The church's moral teachings are not arbitrary, permitting or forbidding things regardless of their relationship to human goodness, said Father Augustine DiNoia, undersecretary of the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith.

This is not blind obedience, about obeying rules, but acceptance of the help the church offers to allow us to do a better job of carrying out our responsibilities, he said.

If we are to bring about change in our culture, Christians must overcome the barriers to misunderstanding about the faith.

Change will come from people who see elimination of selfishness in relation to God's plan for us.

Our resolve to meet the needs of the poor, homeless and hungry will be tested.

In pursuit of promised change on a national political level, new policies will be proposed. Some will be in concert with our beliefs, others will be in opposition.

While we can't yield on principles, we can make an effort to show we can be strong in our views as well as be proponents of positives, not negatives.

Christ turned the world upside down. We cannot spare the change.

True worship entails honoring God concretely in daily life, pope says

The Pope Speaks

POPE
BENEDICT XVI

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — True worship entails honoring God, not in the abstract, but concretely in one's daily life, Pope Benedict XVI said.

Christians are called to offer themselves "as a living sacrifice, holy and pleasing to God," and to glorify God in their "full daily existence," he said Jan. 7 at the first weekly general audience of 2009.

The pope extended his New Year's greetings to about 4,000 pilgrims gathered inside the Paul VI hall. He called on the faithful to renew their dedication to "opening one's heart and mind to Christ."

May the faithful continue to seek to live as true friends of Christ, he said.

"His companionship will mean that, even with this year's inevitable difficulties, the year can be a journey full of joy and peace," he said.

"In fact, only if we stay united with Jesus will it be a good and happy new year," he added.

In his catechesis, Pope Benedict continued his audience talks about the life and teaching of St. Paul, focusing on the apostle's definition of true worship.

Here is the text of the pope's audience remarks in English.

Dear Brothers and Sisters,

At the beginning of this new year, I offer all of you my cordial good wishes.

In the coming months, may our minds and hearts be opened ever more fully to Christ, following the example of St. Paul, whose life and doctrine we have been considering during this Pauline year.

Today we turn to the meaning of "true worship" as highlighted in Paul's Letter to the Romans. In uniting us to himself, Christ, a temple "not made with human hands," has made us a "living sacrifice."

Paul thus exhorts us to offer our own "bodies" — meaning our entire selves — as a "spiritual worship": not in the abstract, but in our concrete daily life.

At the same time, this true worship does not come about merely through human effort. Rather, through baptism, we have become "one in Christ Jesus" (Gal 3:28), who took upon himself our human nature and has thus "assumed" us into himself.

Only he has the power, by joining us to his body, to unite all people.

Thus, the goal of the church's missionary activity is to call everyone into this "cosmic liturgy," in which the world becomes the glory of God: "a pleasing sacrifice, sanctified by the Holy Spirit."

How do you own your property?

Review is important for property distribution at end of life

Many people begin a new year with review of their goals, objectives and solutions, and often this includes a review of their overall estate plan. End-of-life planning for the Christian steward includes developing a well thought-out plan for the distribution of property.

People own property in various ways: by themselves, with another person or as part of a revocable living trust.

How you own your property is important in your planning to include bequests and other planned charitable gifts to the Catholic Church through your parish, a Catholic school, a Catholic agency, the diocesan foundation or the diocese of Charlotte.

Your plan will need to coordinate your asset beneficiary designations — and how you own your property with your will and/or revocable living trust documents — to ensure your property passes to your intended family, church and any other charity beneficiaries.

If your trust agreement provides for bequests or charitable gifts, but your property is not in the trust name, there may be no gifts to the church, depending on how you actually own the property.

If, for example, you own marketable securities with another person as joint tenants with right of survivorship, the property will pass to the surviving owner and not to the church through your trust.

Joint tenancy with right of survivorship

Many people own property with another person as joint tenants with right of survivorship. If the joint tenants are husband and wife, this form of ownership is referred to as "tenants by the entirety."

The survivorship feature is key, since at the death of the first joint tenant the property passes directly to the survivor.

For example, if a husband and wife own their home as tenants by the entirety, the home will pass directly to the wife if her husband dies. It does not pass through the husband's will or trust. The wife would then own the property in her individual name.

Many people believe that because property will automatically pass to the surviving joint tenant, there is no need for a will. However, to revisit the above example, the property that has now become the wife's alone will pass by intestacy at her death unless she has a will.

This means the state statute will determine who gets the wife's property.

If the couple should pass away together, for example in an accident, there would be no survivor to make a will to avoid intestacy.

Having wills in place — regardless of how property is owned — can avoid an unhappy situation.

Revocable living trust

Another issue involves the common use of a revocable living trust in modern estate plans.

A trust serves many purposes: it avoids probate court procedures, avoids or reduces estate taxes, ensures privacy and provides for the successor trustee to manage the trust assets when you die or become incapacitated.

It is important to retitle your assets in the name of the trust when you establish it in order to take advantage of all the benefits offered by a revocable living trust.

As you review property ownership within your overall estate plan, please give prayerful consideration to making a gift to the Catholic Church through bequests to your parish, a Catholic school, a Catholic agency, the diocesan foundation or the Diocese of Charlotte.

There and back again

Migrant farmworkers come and go daily to Arizona fields

BY BERN ZOVISTOSKI
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

YUMA, Ariz. — In the wee hours of the morning, in the chilly darkness, they head for work.

Starting as early as 1 or 2 a.m., they walk or catch rides to the border and cross — often a time-consuming ordeal — and then climb into buses that carry them to the produce fields.

There, they labor all day, returning home after dark.

The next day, they do it all over again. And again the next day.

The work is challenging for the Mexican men and women who make their living in the fields of southwestern Arizona, in and around Yuma.

It's so difficult, in fact, that many young people today pass up the opportunity.

To see the plight of the farmworkers firsthand, Tucson Bishop Gerald F. Kicanas journeyed to the fields in Yuma County and San Luis Rio Colorado, in the Mexican state of Sonora, for the second time in a year.

He described the Dec. 4-6 tour as "a unique educational and spiritual experience."

"Clearly," Bishop Kicanas said,

"Clearly our church needs to find even more ways to reach out pastorally to those who labor in these fields ... to advocate for them."

Bishop Gerald F. Kicanas of Tucson, Ariz., talks with migrant farmworkers in San Luis Rio Colorado, Mexico Dec. 4. The bishop celebrated a special Mass for the farmworkers.

Chicago, Bishop Jose Isidro Guerrero Macias of Mexicali, Mexico, and a host of other church officials.

Bishop Kicanas said the group's goal is to "link the church and the farmworkers into a coalition" to promote justice.

"The farmworkers we met have little," he said, "but their faith in Christ is strong."

"The goal was to introduce our guests to the people who labor in the produce industry on both sides of the border," Bishop Kicanas said.

"We wanted them to learn about the many challenges and concerns related to migrant labor, working conditions, border security and the economy of the produce industry," he said.

An estimated 15,000 to 18,000 workers cross the border at San Luis every day, said grower Rick Rademacher.

"They want to work here and go home at night," he said. "All they want is a job. Most are proud Mexican citizens."

Planting, thinning and harvesting the produce "requires expert human hands and eyes," said Rademacher.

In return for their skills, the documented workers are paid $8.37 an hour. Other workers are paid little more than $1 an hour for their toil.

During the winter months, the region produces most of the lettuce supplied to markets throughout the United States.

Cauliflower, green onions and dates are among the other crops produced on 175,000 acres of deep fertile soil deposited by the Colorado River over the centuries.

Growing conditions are ideal, with sunshine 94.6 percent of the time and a 350-day growing season, said Kurt Nolte, a University of Arizona agriculture employee. A third of Arizona's agricultural production, amounting to $3.2 billion annually, comes from the region.

Nolte, some growers and others gave the visitors presentations before the entourage went into the fields to talk with the laborers in Dome Valley east of Yuma.

Grower Gary Pasquinelli, a member of St. Francis of Assisi Church in Yuma, said farming is "a labor-intensive industry" and maintaining a reliable workforce is problematic at best.

The domestic labor pool is shrinking and aging, and domestic employees are becoming less and less dependable, he said, so the potential answer for the future is workers from Mexico.

Janine Duron, executive director of the Independent Agricultural Workers Center, guided a visit to San Luis Rio Colorado, in Mexico, including stop at the homes of some migrant worker where children played in the packed-dirt yards and shared an outhouse.

The center's goal is "to help farmworkers and employers prosper in their finances and families," she said.

Duron said substance abuse, mainly alcohol, runs high in the workforce.

"Many use substances to help them get up to work another day, and others get to sleep at night," she said.

Duron noted that work and travel time can easily consume 14 to 18 hours a day.

With a diminishing number of able and willing domestic farmworkers, Duron said, growers are increasingly attracted to the federal government's H2A foreign guest-worker program and the center is working with small employers and guest-worker candidates to help facilitate the H2A process.

The group's tour wrapped up Dec. 6 at an onion plant in San Luis Rio Colorado, where about 700 men, women and children gathered for a Mass in which all three bishops participated.

MAKING MASTERPIECES

A worker prepares materials for a mosaic in a dome in the Basilica of the National Shrine of the Immaculate Conception in Washington in 2008. The mosaic is one of several designed by the Rambusch family at the basilica. The fourth-generation family company just celebrated its 110th anniversary.

Fourth generation of Catholic family designs, restores churches around country

WASHINGTON (CNS) — The Rambusch family knows just about everything there is to know about Catholic churches, from installing mosaic artwork and modern lighting systems to designing tabernacles, crosses, altars, pews and stained-glass windows.

The Rambusch Company, a fourth-generation family business that just celebrated its 110th anniversary, has had many projects over the years in synagogues, state capitols, government buildings and museums across the country.

But the church work has a way of standing out.

Maybe that's because the first clients for Frode Rambusch, an immigrant from Denmark who started the company in 1898, were Catholic churches in Brooklyn, N.Y. Churches have remained steady clients over the generations either as repeat customers needing restoration work or new church buildings and additions.

At the Basilica of the National Shrine of the Immaculate Conception in Washington, D.C., Rambusch is a familiar name.

In 1931, the company designed and installed the basilica's first chapel dedicated to Our Lady of Lourdes. Since then, they have designed several other chapels in the basilica, many of the stained-glass windows and much of the lighting.

Most recently, the firm designed and oversaw the basilica's mosaic ceiling domes.

Other repeat clients include the Cathedral of St. Joseph in Wheeling, W.Va., where the Rambusch company designed ironwork in 1927 and just last year designed a new lighting system.

At St. Patrick's Cathedral in New York the firm designed a chapel in 1908 and recently restored the cathedral's windows and lighting fixtures.

Viggo F.E. Rambusch, son of the company's founder, worked on more than 1,000 Catholic churches in his 62 years in the business before he died in 1997. In 1988, he was recognized as the "dean of American church architects" by The Catholic University of America in Washington.

His son, Viggo B.A. Rambusch, the past president of the company who continues to work part time as the firm's senior project manager, said the church work has been "the most satisfying" part of the business, particularly renovating old churches, which he likened to a major recycling effort.

"We're blessed to be allowed to do this," he said.

In her last school stop, first lady Laura Bush visits Catholic school

BETHESDA, Md. (CNS) — First lady Laura Bush, who has visited countless schools in the United States and foreign countries, made her last school visit Jan. 13 to Little Flower School, a Catholic school in the Washington suburb of Bethesda.

"Today is my very last school visit while my husband is president," she told the students, faculty and staff. "I wanted to end my school visit with a terrific school like Little Flower."

Bush praised the school for receiving the U.S. Department of Education's Blue Ribbon Schools Award last fall in recognition of its academic achievement.

"That's really a wonderful accomplishment," she said. "Congratulations on being such smart kids."

Washington Archbishop Donald W. Wuerl introduced Bush and noted the first lady was "no stranger to education and no stranger to our schools." A year ago, Bush visited Holy Redeemer School in Washington. Both visits were to commemorate Catholic Schools Week, an annual observance which this year will be celebrated Jan. 25-31 with the theme: "Catholic Schools Celebrate Service."

Bush told the school that as a former librarian and a teacher she has always been interested in education. She noted that many of the first schools in the United States were Catholic schools. She urged members of the school community to take time during Catholic Schools Week to talk to government leaders about the importance of Catholic education.

A group of students then presented the first lady with a bouquet of roses.

Bush told the students she had cleaned out her office and found many children's books which she was donating to their library.

"This is a wonderful day for Little Flower," said Sister Rosemaron Rynn, a member of the Congregation of the Sisters, Servants of the Immaculate Heart of Mary and the school's principal.

U.S. church-state model faces new challenges, speakers say

ROME (CNS) — The traditional U.S. model of church-state relations has been praised by Pope Benedict XVI as a form of "healthy secularism," but it risks being eroded by those who want to limit religion's influence in public life, speakers at a Rome conference said.

The conference Jan. 13 marked the 25th anniversary of formal diplomatic relations between the United States and the Holy See, and was the last of five encounters sponsored by the U.S. Embassy to the Vatican on the theme of religious liberty.

The U.S. ambassador to the Vatican, Mary Ann Glendon, pointed out there are competing models of religious freedom in the U.S. and the future of church-state relations is a subject of intense debate.

Speakers agreed there are persistent efforts to restrict religion to the private sphere — something not intended by the framers of the U.S. Constitution.

Philip Hamburger, a professor at Columbia Law School in New York, said the original U.S. idea of "disestablishment," which prevented the government from establishing an official state church, has been increasingly replaced by the notion of strict separation between church and state.

Richard Garnett, a professor at the University of Notre Dame Law School, said there are three competing concepts of religious freedom in the U.S. today — freedom from religion, freedom of religion and freedom for religion. He said the freedom-for-religion model was closest to the ideas of the U.S. Founding Fathers.

The Constitution, he said, was clearly designed for a religious people, and its authors did not "want to push religion to the margins in the hope that it will wither." Rather, they sought to distinguish between the authorities and structures of religion and those of government, mainly as a safeguard against state interference in religious life.

Gaza Strip resembles a concentration camp, says top Vatican official

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — The Gaza Strip increasingly is looking like "a big concentration camp" while egoism, hatred, poverty and injustice are fueling the continual slaughter in the Holy Land, said a top Vatican official.

"We are seeing a continual massacre in the Holy Land where the overwhelming majority has nothing to do with the conflict, but it is paying for the hatred of a few with their lives," said Cardinal Renato Martino, head of the Pontifical Council for Justice and Peace.

"Let's look at the conditions in Gaza: It's looking more and more like a big concentration camp," he said in an interview Jan. 7.

Israel's ambassador to the Vatican, Mordechai Lewy, criticized the cardinal's comments saying they were "way out of line."

However, the remarks have not negatively affected Vatican-Israeli relations which are still "good as before," said the ambassador Jan. 8.

That the cardinal would make the comparison "shows he has never visited a concentration camp," he added.

Meanwhile, Israel's foreign ministry spokesman, Yigal Palmor, said Cardinal

Martino's comments "seem to have come directly from Hamas propaganda" and did nothing "to help bring people closer to the truth and peace."

By saying the Gaza Strip resembled a concentration camp, the cardinal was ignoring "the unspeakable crimes" committed by the Palestinian militant group Hamas, he said Jan. 7.

Palmor said Hamas "has derailed the peace process and has turned the Gaza Strip into a giant human shield."

Cardinal Martino defended his description of the Gaza Strip, saying those who criticized his remarks "can say what they want. The situation in Gaza is horrible."

"I say, look at the conditions of the people who live there. Surrounded by a wall that is difficult to cross — in conditions (that are) contrary to human dignity. What has been happening recently there is horrifying," he said.

He said there was nothing in his comments "that may be interpreted as anti-Israeli" and he condemned Hamas' use of violence against Israel.

Pope Benedict urged both sides Jan. 8 to resume negotiations and agree to "the rejection of hatred, acts of provocation and the use of arms."

Parishioners make covenants as Mercy Associates

BELMONT — Seven people recently became Mercy Associates with the Sisters of Mercy.

The six women and one man participated in a covenant ceremony in Cardinal Gibbons Chapel at Sacred Heart Convent in Belmont Dec. 7.

During the ceremony, each new Mercy Associate read and signed a covenant with the Sisters of Mercy and received a Mercy Association pin.

Jayne Mannino, Ruth Turgeon, Sherry Anulies, Frances Dewalt, Lincoln Sigwald, Juanzia Dewalt and Jackie Lang now join the more than 100 Mercy Associates currently serving in western North Carolina.

While maintaining independent lifestyles, Mercy Associates make formal covenants to extend the Sisters of Mercy mission by participating in service to the poor, sick and uneducated.

Mercy Associates also share opportunities for friendship, prayer, hospitality and celebration with the Sisters of Mercy.

"As Associates, we attend meetings, retreats and appropriate social gatherings" with the Sisters of Mercy, said Jayne Mannino, a parishioner of Holy Spirit Church in Denver.

"We draw support from and lend support to the Sisters of Mercy," she said.

Mannino said some Mercy Associates are employed by the Sisters of Mercy in affiliated organizations, some perform volunteer work with the Sisters and others bring the Mercy mission to their families and work places.

The Sisters of Mercy offer other opportunities for lay men and women to serve through the Mercy Volunteer Corps and Companions in Mercy.

Deafblind man overcomes disabilities to serve God

Twenty-one-year-old Patrick, who was born blind and lost his hearing by the time he was three, has been an altar server since sixth grade.

where he learned pre-Braille skills.

Now he utilizes finger spelling to communicate — a method by which Patrick uses his hands to feel the letters that are being signed to him.

The youngest of five children, Patrick began kindergarten at the Catholic school that his older sisters and brother attended, but, due to the separation of church and state, disability services could not be provided at the parochial school.

His mother, Patricia, remembers that time as a particularly tough period for their family.

"The biggest help of all was Christ in the Blessed Sacrament," she said, recalling one instance in particular, when she sat in adoration and cried for more than an hour.

"I couldn't pray, I couldn't ask God what I needed. But he knew what I needed and he gave it to me," she said.

The next day she remembered the name of a man who worked for the New York Commission for the Blind. He had visited the Vellias shortly after Patrick was born and told them to contact him if they ever needed help.

He arranged for Patrick to receive disability services at the public school and made plans for him to attend the Helen Keller National Center summer camp.

"I think his older siblings motivated him," said his mother, because they never treated him like he was different.

In high school, Patrick took advanced placement classes so that he could earn an advanced diploma like his older siblings. His mother said she was nervous on the day of his graduation when the ceremony was moved inside due to rain.

"He didn't practice with those stairs," she said.

When Patrick walked across the stage, everyone in the auditorium was on their feet.

"I graduated with the loudest standing ovation, but didn't even notice," he said with a laugh.

Guided by faith

"Because of his disabilities he is a very compassionate person," said Patricia.

At Holy Spirit Church, the parish has embraced Patrick in his role as altar server. He seems perfectly comfortable in the role, although part of that could be attributed to his upbringing.

"I worked in the rectory for 11 years in New York," said his mother. "He was always around the church."

Patrick trained as an altar server when he was in sixth grade.

He likes serving because "it doesn't put me to sleep like sitting in the pews," he joked.

Patrick uses a Braille missal from the Xavier Society for the Blind, which serves as the National Catholic Press and Lending Library for the visually impaired. It helps him follow along during Mass, even though he said it can be hard to read the Braille while standing up.

He does get frustrated sometimes. "What drives me crazy is that the choir won't stay with the book," he joked.

Father Carmen Malacari, pastor of Holy Spirit Church, told Patrick about the Xavier Society for the Blind and their free service of providing Catholic reading materials in Braille.

Prior to that, when Patrick was serving as a lector at his parish in New York, he used to translate the readings to Braille and memorize them so he could recite them at Mass.

Looking to the future

Now, Patrick is in school at Central Piedmont Community College in Charlotte, where he has three interpreters to translate his classes. One of the biggest challenges he faces these days is not being able to drive.

"I still have to rely on Mom and Dad to get to school unless I take the bus," he said.

And although he currently is very focused on finishing his education, his mother said that on more than one occasion he has expressed an interest in becoming a priest.

In 2006, Patrick met Father Cyril Axelrod, the world's only "deafblind" priest. Father Axelrod is the pastoral support development coordinator for DeafBlind UK, a national charity offering specialist services and human support to deafblind people and those who have progressive sight and hearing loss. Patrick had read Father Axelrod's autobiography and was inspired by his story, but he said meeting him in person was even more meaningful.

Patrick has always been very dedicated when it comes to his faith.

His mother recalled a time when Patrick went to Seattle for the summer on a scholarship for a computer science program. Within the first week he had found a Catholic church where he could attend Mass on Sundays.

"He told me, 'Don't worry,'" she said, "I have to go through the woods and cross over 49th street, but don't worry — I have assistance."

He also found a nun at the parish who was able to interpret the Mass for him.

"People are surprised that he does as well as he does," said his mother.

There are a lot of things about Patrick that may surprise people.

One that he is particularly proud of is that he currently holds a black belt in martial arts.

"He has really had to overcome a lot," said Patricia. "I just pray so much because (God) has really brought us through."

Upcoming rallies to mark abortion anniversary well as the following days.

Charlotte Bishop Peter J. Jugis will concelebrate a Mass celebrated by Raleigh Bishop Michael F. Burbidge at the Basilica of the National Shrine of the Immaculate Conception in Washington before the march.

Bishop Jugis participated in the annual Charlotte March for Life Jan. 16, and joined Bishop Burbidge for the Raleigh March for Life Jan. 17.

In Washington, the main event will begin with a noon rally on the National Mall, followed by a march along Constitution Avenue that will end at the U.S. Supreme Court.

From there, participants are encouraged to meet with members of Congress to lobby on abortion-related issues.

"The first session of the 111th Congress will convene in January, with all newly elected members of the House and many newly elected members of the Senate," organizers of the march wrote on the official Web site, www.marchforlife.org.

"We shall be a large group of Americans to bring our prayers and our important simple pro-life message to this new administration and new Congress," they said.

With millions expected in Washington for inauguration events the week of Jan. 19 and the thousands of participants anticipated for the march and related activities, organizers said it will be a "crazy week" in the nation's capital.

The theme of this year's march is "Remember — The Life Principles Mean 'Equal Care' With No Exceptions," meaning the intentional killing of even one unborn human is never justified or necessary, the Web site said.

Organizers are also stressing that the United States must provide equal care for both a pregnant mother and her unborn child.

Vigil prayers

The National Prayer Vigil for Life will begin an all-night vigil with a 7 p.m. Mass Jan. 21 at the Basilica of the National Shrine of the Immaculate Conception and conclude with a 7:30 a.m. liturgy Jan. 22.

Cardinal Justin Rigali of Philadelphia, chairman of the U.S. bishops' Committee on Pro-Life Activities, will celebrate the evening Mass and Bishop Paul S. Loverde of Arlington, Va., will be the principal celebrant for the morning Mass.

For the first time since the all-night vigil has been held, the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops will direct people who won't fit into the basilica for the events to similar Masses within walking distance, said Deirdre McQuade, assistant director for policy and communications for the USCCB's Office of Pro-Life Activities.

"We estimate that 12,000 people were at the vigil last year," McQuade told Catholic News Service Jan. 5.

"If we have such a crowd this year, we may not be able to accommodate everyone in the basilica. So, we're making sure they have a place to worship close by," she said. "We want everyone to have an opportunity to participate."

Earlier on Jan. 21, the Sisters of Life will host an afternoon of prayerful remembrance and intercession at the Crypt Church of the basilica from 1-4 p.m. to allow men and women whose lives have been affected by abortion to pray and seek God's healing and forgiveness, McQuade said.

Other events

Several other events will take place in Washington and around the country to mark the anniversary of the Supreme Court's 1973 decision.

From 10 a.m. to 4 p.m. Jan. 21 the Cardinal O'Connor Conference on Life will be held at Georgetown University in Washington; the conference is intended to educate college and high school students.

On the morning of the annual March for Life, Bishop Jugis will give the homily at an 11:30 a.m. Mass celebrated by Bishop Burbidge in the basilica.

The Washington Archdiocese expects more than 20,000 Catholic teens and young adults from all over the United States to attend its youth rally at the Verizon Center, Washington's largest sports arena, from 7:30-11:30 a.m., with a 10 a.m. Mass celebrated by Washington Archbishop Donald W. Wuerl.

The Filipino Family Fund and Culture of Life Foundation will host the third annual "Champions for Family" awards reception Jan. 22 at the Phoenix Park Hotel in Washington.

Honorees include U.S. Rep. Joseph R. Pitts, R-Pa.; Dr. Rene Bullecer, who heads Human Life International in the Philippines; and Father Jerome Magat, parochial vicar at Our Lady of Lourdes Church in Arlington, Va., and founder of the Guadalupe Free Clinic, a free medical clinic for the poor.

On Jan. 23 the American Life League will hold a conference from 7:30 a.m. to 3 p.m. at the Liaison Capitol Hill Hotel in Washington, followed by a 6 p.m. concert sponsored by Students for Life of America and featuring Barlow Girl and Laura Ingraham.

Postcard campaign aims to fight abortion legislation

Congress to pass the Freedom of Choice Act (FOCA).

The target weekend for the "Fight FOCA Postcard Campaign" is scheduled for Jan. 24-25.

"This legislation is extremely dangerous," said Maggie Nadol, director of Respect Life, a program of Catholic Social Services of the Diocese of Charlotte.

FOCA was introduced in the 110th Congress April 19, 2007, declaring that it is the policy of the United States that every woman has the "fundamental right" to terminate a pregnancy.

If passed, the act would prohibit government at every level — federal, state and local — from "interfering" with a woman's right to choose, and from "discriminating" against the exercise of this right.

"The many gains that we have made in promoting and ensuring the sanctity of human life may be swept away," said Nadol.

"As Catholics, we want our voices heard and this postcard campaign is one way that we can do it in a unified manner," she said.

Campaign packets are available from the National Committee for a Human Life Amendment, the organization behind the campaign.

Packets contain a parish manual with explicit directions and suggestions on how to expedite the campaign on the parish level. The packets also contain flyers and postcards, which are available in English and Spanish.

"The idea is to really flood Washington with a large amount (of postcards) in a short amount of time," said Nadol.

Sharing a 'great hope for peace'

U.S. bishop in West Bank expresses solidarity with Catholics

BY JUDITH SUDILOVSKY
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

RAFIDIA, West Bank — During a pastoral visit to the Holy Land, the vice president of the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops expressed solidarity with Palestinian Catholics in the West Bank and focused on the situation in Gaza.

"We have come here at a troubled time with the escalation of violence in Gaza so clearly on the minds of people resurrecting the history of hurts and struggles of Palestinian and Israeli existence," said Bishop Gerald F. Kicanas of Tucson, Ariz., who was in the Holy Land as part of the Coordination of Episcopal Conferences in Support of the Church of the Holy Land.

The bishop said he saw how "deeply ingrained" the historical wounds are and sensed the people's discouragement that things can change and peace can emerge in the region.

Bishop Kicanas had hoped to visit Gaza as part of his planned itinerary, but the ongoing Israeli military attacks on Gaza made that impossible.

The delegation, in the Holy Land Jan. 9-15, also was to meet with Archbishop Antonio Franco, Vatican nuncio to Israel and the Palestinian territories, Latin Patriarch Fouad Twal of Jerusalem, Israeli President Shimon Peres and Palestinian Prime Minister Mahmoud Abbas.

The purpose of the episcopal conferences' group is to express support and solidarity with Palestinian Catholics, said Bishop Kicanas, and to express to the world the desire for peace in the Holy Land.

During Mass Jan. 11 at the tiny St. Justin Church in Rafidia, adjacent to Nablus, Bishop Kicanas offered prayers for peace and hope for the victims of violence.

"Our prayers go especially for those who are suffering and experiencing so much fear in Gaza," the bishop said in English, lamenting the fact that his Lebanese-born parents had not taught him Arabic.

"We love you as sisters and brothers. We share our faith together and that faith brings us great hope for peace and security for all people," he said.

Israel launched its aerial attacks Dec. 27 to stop an eight-yearlong campaign of rocket attacks into Israeli border towns by the Palestinian militant group Hamas in Gaza.

Demonstrators and church and political leaders around the world have called for a cease-fire and an end to the violence as hundreds of civilians have been killed and many more are in desperate need of humanitarian aid.

On Jan. 9, an Israeli airstrike destroyed a clinic in Gaza run by Caritas Jerusalem, a local Catholic aid agency.

'Circle of violence'

During a Jan. 9 session of the U.N. Human Rights Council concerning the situation, Archbishop Silvano Tomasi, the Vatican representative to U.N. agencies in Geneva, called on the international community to help end the conflict.

He said, "It is evident that the warring parties are not able to exit from this vicious circle of violence without the help of the international community that should therefore fulfill its responsibilities, intervene actively to stop the bloodshed, provide access for emergency humanitarian assistance and end all forms of confrontation."

Meanwhile, Bishop Kicanas, who has visited the Holy Land on six previous occasions, noted that only by actually seeing things on the ground can one begin to understand the complexity of the situation.

"There is nothing more important than to come see firsthand. You learn much more and become open to the complexities of the situation," he told Catholic News Service.

Driving to Rafidia from Bethlehem, the bishop saw the Israeli settlements in the West Bank and witnessed the lines of Palestinian cars waiting to go through the numerous Israeli checkpoints along the way.

Circle of faith

Bishop Kicanas was "impressed" by the enthusiasm of the singing of the parishioners of St. Justin Church and their expression of faith.

The remote northern parish, some 20 miles north of Ramallah, rarely receives foreign guests, said Father Vincent Nagle, St. Justin Church's parish priest.

Several older parishioners come to Mass from villages where they are the only Christians left.

About 750 Christians live among 200,000 Muslims in Nablus and the surrounding area, added Father Nagle.

Visits make them feel that there are people who are concerned about them, said parishioner Deema Hanna, 27, who was among the youngest of the mostly female worshippers at the Mass.

"The Islamic world here is very strong. Any Christian who wants to do something here in Nablus, they don't have an opportunity. Sometimes we feel encircled," she said. "Our Christian community is not strong like in" the Bethlehem area.

Hilda Shyradeh, 58, described the Christians of Nablus to the bishop.

"All our neighbors are Muslims. In Nablus the Christians who have left have sold their homes to Muslims. Who else will buy them?" she said.

"We need everyone to come here and encourage us for everything, to be in our homes, to be in our country. We are small. The youth are leaving when they finish their studies," said Shyradeh.

"Sometimes it is the (Israeli) occupation pushing us out and sometimes it is the Muslims getting us out," she said.

Bishop Kicanas said he was impressed by the dedication of the parish to its small Catholic school and efforts to provide a Catholic education to the children.

"They are eager to do what they can for the young people. Obviously to educate children in a Catholic context anywhere is expensive," he said.

Together with other members of the delegation, Bishop Kicanas met with students of Bethlehem University Jan. 10.

He was concerned, he said, by the tentative nature of their future plans because of the uncertainty of their lives.

Churches, agencies help unemployed parishioners

Employment Security Commission Jan. 6.

In recent weeks, North Carolina became one of three states where electronic unemployment filing systems crashed due to the heavy volume of unemployed citizens seeking benefits.

As a result, more and more out-of-work Catholics are turning to the church for help.

At St. Matthew Church in Charlotte, attendance at the Christians in Career Transition meetings has more than tripled in recent months, according to organizer Deacon Jim Hamrlik.

The ministry, which is devoted to helping people in career crisis, meets twice a month at the church and focuses primarily on helping people with networking, interviewing skills and resumé writing.

"We try to give them everything that is going to set them up to be successful," said Deacon Hamrlik.

"Sixty to 70 percent of people find jobs within three to six months," he said. "It is just a matter of them finding the formula."

St. Mark Church in Huntersville is starting a similar ministry for workers in transition called Joseph's People.

"We think a lot of people in the parish and community will benefit from it," said organizer John Buckner, a St. Mark Church parishioner.

The ultimate goal of the ministry will be to shorten the length of time that people are out of work, he said.

Fellow parishioner Larry Duke, an executive recruiter, has been holding career counseling workshops at the church.

Buckner said high attendance at those workshops confirmed the need for a ministry dedicated to helping unemployed parishioners find jobs.

Up until last year, St. Paul the Apostle Church in Greensboro hosted a re-employment support group.

Now church workers meet with job seekers on an individual basis, according to Colleen Assal, director of parish outreach.

Assal said the number of people coming for one-on-one assistance varies, but that they are considering reinstating the support group sometime this month if needed.

"We're hearing more and more folks are losing their jobs," she said.

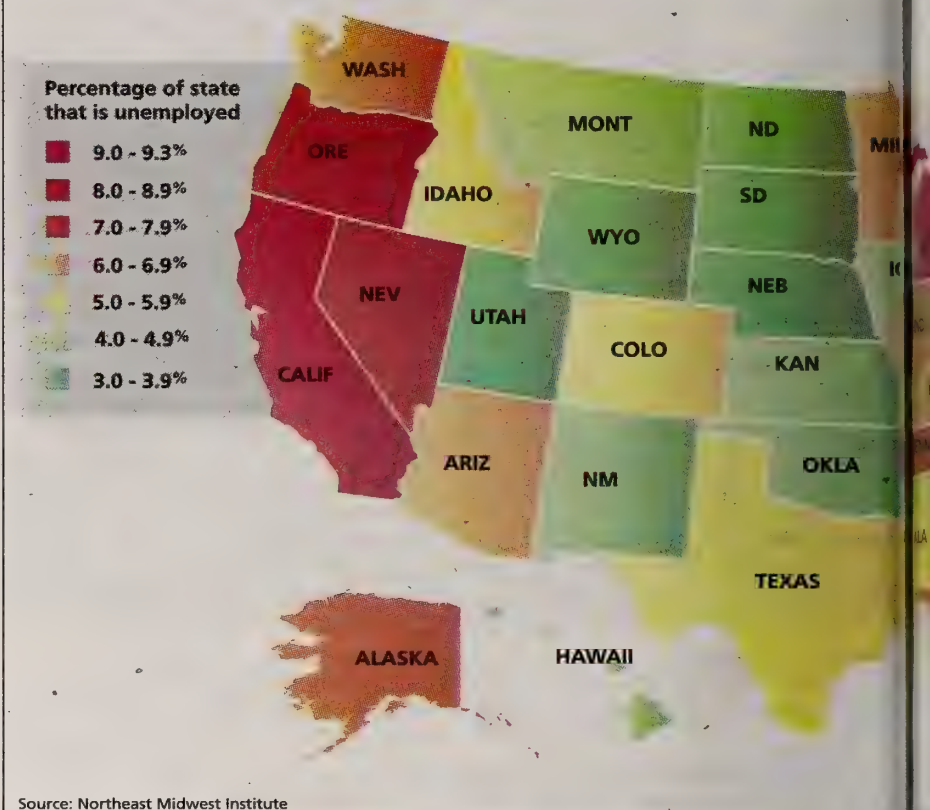

Beyond the diocese, Interfaith Worker Justice (IWJ), a nonprofit religious organization that works to improve wages, benefits and conditions for workers, has recently prepared a "congregational toolkit" to help unemployed workers.

"Congregations have always stood by unemployed workers in times of struggle," said Auxiliary Bishop Gabino Zavala of Los Angeles, who serves as co-president of IWJ's board of directors.

The toolkit outlines what resources are available to unemployed workers, suggests how to establish support groups for unemployed workers, and offers

Unemployment Rates by State

The southern and far-western states have some of the high worship aids for lifting up unemployed workers and employers in this time of crisis.

"These congregational tools help us fulfill our mission of serving God's people," said Bishop Zavala.

In the meantime, St. Paul the Apostle Church, like many other churches in the diocese, is focusing on how to help parishioners deal with the impact of the economy by meeting their immediate needs.

"We have the food pantry assistance that we offer to our parishioners as well as to anyone who is referred to us or comes in off the streets," said Assal.

The food pantry at St. Francis of Assisi Church in Franklin assisted an average of 30 to 50 families a week in the first half of 2008.

"We have seen two differences this year," wrote Pat Tuscany, a lay volunteer with the parish who helps coordinate the food pantry's efforts, in a report to parishioners.

"The first is a significant growth in people asking for assistance," she said.

The second is that "we are seeing more young families who occasionally have difficulty making ends meet."

The Office of Economic Opportunity in Murphy, a program of Catholic Social Services' Office of Justice and Peace, serves Catholics and other individuals struggling with economic difficulties in Cherokee, Clay, Graham and Swain counties.

"We have seen an increase in people who can't pay their bills," said Claudie Burchfield, OEO director.

"Unfortunately, our area is a low-income part of the state; people are already living in poverty day to day," she said.

Burchfield said the slow down of the housing market has been particularly devastating because so many people in the area work in the construction field.

As a resource hub, Burchfield said her office does "anything and everything to help people."

"We're centered on the holistic approach of helping the family better itself," she said.

And in times like these, she said they are particularly challenged to think "outside the box."

The theme of self-empowerment also is a focus of the career ministries on the parish level.

The group at St. Matthew Church uses “Living Your Strengths,” an assessment from the Gallop Organization to help people determine their top five God-given talents.
Deacon Hamrik said concentrating on strengths helps to reverse the sense of failure that sometimes occurs upon losing a job.
The assessment focuses on the unique abilities of the individuals and helps them feel better about themselves.
At St. Mark Church, Buckner said they will also stress the importance of having a spiritual component to their ministry.
“Losing a job is a spiritual crisis,” he said. “We want people to understand that God is with them, the church is supporting them and there are caring Catholics who want to help.”

Latin America to face ‘economic stress’ in 2009

Unemployment, poverty expected to rise

LIMA, Peru (CNS) — The global economic downturn has cast a pall over the new year in Latin America.
While the region’s leaders initially struck a positive note in the face of bad news from abroad, most are now drafting plans to create jobs, keep financial systems from wobbling and shore up social programs in case of a prolonged recession.
“It’s very hard to have an upbeat outlook about the region,” where countries “are going to be under enormous stress,” Michael Shifter, vice president for policy at the Washington-based Inter-American Dialogue and adjunct professor of Latin American politics at Georgetown University, told Catholic News Service.
Experts say the crisis will hit poor Latin Americans hardest. It will increase unemployment, pushing more into the informal economy — without insurance, pensions or other benefits — and widen the gap between rich and poor.
Economic hardship and cuts in social spending may trigger discontent reflected at the polls or in the streets.
The worldwide financial crisis has ended a half-decade boom that saw the region’s economy expand by an average of 5 percent a year, with some countries — including Argentina, Peru, Costa Rica and the Dominican Republic — growing by more than 7 percent.
The rate slowed to 4.6 percent in 2008, and the most optimistic growth forecast for 2009, by the U.N. Economic Commission for Latin America and the Caribbean, is 1.9 percent.
The boom was spurred by exports of raw materials such as minerals, oil and timber to the United States and emerging giants like China, as well as money sent home by migrants working abroad.
The bonanza left most of the region’s countries with a budget surplus that will cushion them against a global recession but cannot protect them completely, according to the U.N. commission’s report issued in December.
The plunge in world oil prices has hit countries like Brazil, Venezuela, Ecuador and Bolivia, while in Peru decreased demand for metals has led to the layoff of thousands of workers by mining companies and their suppliers.
One concern is that economic woes could have political fallout, especially in countries that have been retooling their political systems in recent years.
Bolivians will go to the polls Jan. 25 to vote on a new constitution that has been a source of controversy and protest. If it is approved, as most observers predict, Congress will have to bring the country’s legislation into line with the new text, and presidential and congressional elections will be scheduled for December.
Presidential elections also will be held this year in Chile, Uruguay, Honduras, El Salvador and Panama.
In Ecuador, where a new constitution was approved last year, indigenous organizations have staged roadblocks to protest laws encouraging large-scale mining that they say would threaten the environment and their way of life.

While some observers fear that the economic crisis will deflect attention from environmental issues in the region, the Amazon likely is to be a concern in 2009, said Rick Jones, deputy regional director for global solidarity and justice at Catholic Relief Services, the U.S. bishops’ international relief and development agency.
In Brazil, where the Catholic bishops have made the Amazon a priority, the government recently announced a plan to cut deforestation in half over the next 10 years. In neighboring Peru, with financial assistance the country could stop deforestation in 10 years. European countries already have pledged more than $7 million for forest conservation.
Budget cutbacks may cause countries to spend less on conservation, however, jeopardizing those plans.
The crunch also is forcing Latin Americans living abroad to make hard choices. Many families in Latin America depend on remittances, the money sent home by relatives abroad. In Central American countries, remittances amount to up to 40 percent of foreign earnings.
But those financial flows have slowed. While remittances jumped from $30 billion to $45.5 billion between 2004 and 2006, the figure leveled off to $45.9 billion last year.
Only half of Latin Americans living abroad said they sent money home in 2008, down from 73 percent in 2006. Cutting the remittance lifeline could push more families below the poverty line, spurring a new wave of migration, according to the Inter-American Development Bank.
People in desperate economic straits may take even greater risks to get past tighter U.S. border controls, making them more likely to fall prey to traffickers who force them into virtual slavery to pay off their travel debt once they get to the United States. Drug smuggling, migrant smuggling and human trafficking have converged under the control of the same cartels, making the migration gamble even more dangerous.
Ultimately, the best crystal ball turns cloudy when queried about 2009, because it is difficult to predict how long the worldwide recession will last or its precise impact on the various parts of an increasingly diverse region.
Both Jones and Shifter expect countries to scale back social programs as they pump more money into jump-starting their economies.

Another book about Merton? This one's well worth the read

REVIEWED BY DAVID GIBSON
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

Forty years after Trappist Father Thomas Merton's death, "so many different people are still sifting through his spiritual journey and finding parts that aid their own," writes Morgan Atkinson in "Soul Searching: The Journey of Thomas Merton."

The subtitle is significant because this book focuses in a unique manner on a spiritual journey — or, better, journeys: Merton's, Atkinson's and the reader's.

"Soul Searching" is not a biography. Nonetheless, it conveys the story of a man who in late 1941 at age 26 left a rather wayward life behind to join the Trappist monks at the Abbey of Gethsemani in Kentucky.

Little did he know that he was soon to be recognized as one of America's foremost writers on spirituality, following the 1948 publication of his best-selling autobiography, "The Seven Storey Mountain."

Today, long after Father Merton's accidental death during a trip to Asia, the vast body of his writing on spirituality and major social issues continues to illuminate, guide and challenge so many!

"I don't know that we have caught up with him yet," says Sister Kathleen Deignan, a Sister of Notre Dame. "To me he's someone who moves ahead. The horizon keeps expanding as he recedes from us."

Sister Deignan, a religious studies professor at Iona College in New Rochelle, N.Y., is one of some 30 people Atkinson interviewed whose reflections are shared with this book's readers. Those interviewed include friends and associates of Father Merton, and experts on his life.

Atkinson refers to them as the "choir," but their assessments are hardly identical.

Atkinson, a longtime filmmaker, has created a one-hour DVD documentary about Father Merton, also titled "Soul Searching: The Journey of Thomas Merton."

Indeed, the publisher terms the DVD and the book "companion" works, and the DVD is included with the book.

But why have the book at all then? Atkinson explains that squeezing more than 60 hours of interviews into an hourlong video left a lot of "very rich material."

He writes: "A book including a far wider sampling of the insights from these interviews offers a great opportunity to share more about this important man and his spiritual journey. If you accept that premise, read on."

Having viewed the DVD and read the book, I encourage you to "accept that premise." I relished the book's ability to make clear that while Father Merton was a cloistered monk and even, at times, a hermit, in so many ways his pilgrimage is our pilgrimage, his quest is ours.

Atkinson says "the main voice" he wanted people to hear was Father Merton's, "speaking in the personal, conversational manner of his journals."

But Atkinson "wanted to complement this with the thoughts of a mix of people who would not simply praise the good monk and great writer but would help present the complexity of this man."

In this, I believe Atkinson succeeded.

I confess that from a young age I admired Father Merton, not because I felt he always had final answers for my biggest questions but because so many of his questions resembled my own. I viewed him as a courageous searcher.

Jonathan Montaldo recalls Father Merton once saying, "I need something that I don't even know yet, something that I don't even know that I don't have."

Montaldo, resident director of the Merton Institute Retreat Center near Gethsemani, was one of those Atkinson interviewed.

"Soul Searching" affords readers an opportunity to look inside Father Merton, so to speak.

Atkinson writes that Father Merton, "despite his extraordinary gifts, had an abundance of human foibles with which most of us struggle." In fact, says Atkinson, this "struggle with his humanity" is what "makes (Father Merton's) writing and life so interesting."

Father Merton possessed a "spiritual curiosity" that manifested "something that characterized him in general," according to Bonnie Thurston, a founding member of the International Thomas Merton Society.

Holy Cross Sister Elena Malits of St. Mary's College in Notre Dame, Ind., thinks Father Merton "was a compulsive writer" who "had to discipline himself not to write."

Father Merton "adamantly refused to let himself be called a conservative or a liberal," she notes.

Do we need another book about Thomas Merton? I asked myself that question when this book arrived. But reading it was a happy experience.

Better than that, it provided a refreshing opportunity to revisit a man who had a marvelous way of pointing ordinary people like me toward a deeper spirituality.

"Societies need people who can stand outside the system and look at it from a different perspective. I think Merton did that," comments Brother Paul Quenon, a monk at Gethsemani.

I think he is right.

Gibson was the founding editor of Origins, Catholic News Service's documentary service. He retired in 2007 after holding that post for 36 years.

It's never too late to turn to and serve Christ

BY JEFF HEDGLEN
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

My wife began her journey back to the Lord in 1988 at an air show at Ramstein Air Base in Germany, four years before I met her.

Her story is tragic and miraculous.

She had been living a fairly worldly life, doing some things that should have had her knocking at the door of the confessional, but in truth she had not darkened the door of a church for almost 10 years.

At that air show, two Italian jets in a maneuver overhead accidentally clipped wings and sent burning jet fuel and plane parts raining down on the crowd.

On either side of her people were killed instantly. She ran for her life.

In the aftermath of the tragedy, she reflected on her life, trying to find an answer to why she, with the way she had been living, had survived.

She had not spoken to God in years, and all she could think of to say was: "God, are you out there? If you exist, then you have to tell me what to do."

This Sunday's readings bring us another story with similar words, St. Paul's first words to Jesus: "Who are you, sir?" and "What shall I do, sir?"

In Acts we learn that on the road to Damascus, where he was going to persecute Christians, St. Paul heard a voice calling out from a bright light, "Why are you persecuting me?"

He replied, "Who are you, sir?"

Then he heard, "I am Jesus the Nazorean whom you are persecuting."

Upon hearing this Paul said: "What shall I do, sir?"

St. Paul had been persecuting Jesus and the early church. His encounter with Jesus was his moment of conversion.

My wife says that she was killing Jesus every day with her choices. The shock of surviving the air show tragedy propelled her to her conversion.

Conversion is the starting point of faith. Whether our turning to Jesus was dramatic or gradual, this feast of the conversion of St. Paul is a good time to remember why it is we believe.

It is never too late — or too often — to ask: Who are you, sir? What shall I do, sir?

Questions:

What is your conversion story?

Who are the people who have helped you grow in faith?

Scripture to be Illustrated:

"Who are you, sir? ... What shall I do, sir?" (Acts 22:8, 10).

Nun works for former student as technical adviser on 'Doubt'

BY MARK PATTISON
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

WASHINGTON — For Sister Margaret McEntee, her roles in religious life have ranged from being a teacher to a campus minister to a fan of a former student's work to working for that former student when he directed a film adaptation of his own Pulitzer Prize-winning play.

And now the "job" for the Sister of Charity, or "Sister Peggy" as she commonly refers to herself, is giving interviews about that student, John Patrick Shanley, and his new movie, "Doubt."

She's been interviewed by CBS News and USA Today, among others.

Yet she still finds time to fulfill her current ministry — being a religion teacher and campus minister at the all-girl Notre Dame High School in Manhattan — and to enjoy the work she had a bit of a hand in creating.

"The movie's actually better than the play," Sister McEntee told Catholic News Service in a Dec. 11 telephone interview from New York City, "and I've seen the play four times."

One reason for her avid early interest is that one of the drama's characters was named after her. Some 50 years ago, Johnny Shanley was a first grader at St. Anthony School in the Bronx. His teacher was Sister Peggy — known then as Sister James.

"Doubt" concerns suspicions harbored by the principal and a teacher at a New York City Catholic grade school, circa 1964, that a parish priest may be molesting the school's first black student.

"Shanley has successfully adapted his drama," said Harry Forbes, director of the U.S. bishops' Office for Film & Broadcasting, in a review of the film.

"Though sexual misconduct is at the heart of the story, it is the balance between doubt which, as Shanley has said, 'allows for growth and change' and premature certainty, which only leads to a 'dead end' — that forms the principal thematic subtext. His metaphorical critique is directed not at the church but at those who insist on absolutes in society at large."

"Doubt" was classified by the JSCCB Office for Film & Broadcasting as A-III — adults, for its "discreetly handled sexual abuse theme."

As technical adviser, Sister McEntee said she, among other things, helped the props crew understand the nature of the Mass before the wave of liturgical reforms — including use of the vernacular — was ushered in starting in Advent 1964.

Although, Sister McEntee told CNS, "I don't think we saw them until 1968" in New York.

Sister McEntee took actress Meryl Streep, one of five "Doubt"-related Golden Globe nominees, to the Sisters of Charity's retirement home in upstate New York to meet Sister Marilda Joseph, "the only living member of our congregation who still wears the old habit" depicted in the movie.

There were lots of pictures taken, she added, and Streep stayed for supper.

Shanley wanted to be a stickler for period accuracy. The exterior of St. Anthony School, which he had attended and where Sister McEntee once taught, was filmed as the fictional St. Nicholas School in the movie.

Moreover, Shanley used names of past classmates, although some were changed for legal issues. One slight change was that of the principal. In "Doubt," it's Sister Aloysius. In real life, it was Sister Aloysia.

And, yes, the principal was every bit as hard as nails as Streep plays her in the movie.

Sister McEntee had high praise for the cast.

"I was just very impressed with the woman's sensitivity," she said of Streep. Philip Seymour Hoffman, who plays the suspected priest, "is a fine man, very engaging and very approachable."

As for Amy Adams, "I just fell in love with her," Sister McEntee said. "She plays Sister James, so I'd better like her!"

She said that at a preview screening attended by other members of her order, they heard "Tantum Ergo" used as a recessional hymn.

"After the preview with the sisters, we said that's really not appropriate," since its use was for Benedictions, she added. "And they changed it."

Sister McEntee, now 73, has acquired a nickname for her recent efforts: "Sister Hollywood." Notre Dame faculty and staff used that moniker while organizing a premiere-night dinner-and-a-movie outing with their newly famous colleague.

For her own part, Sister McEntee thinks that "Doubt" could help with vocations, as the movie shows two sisters in their "loving kindness trying to help a boy they think has been hurt."

But in recalling that she promoted religious life one day to her Notre Dame students, she said, "I looked at my girls: 'I don't know how many years teaching I have left. Wouldn't one of you like to replace me?' And they looked at me like I'm crazy."

1. Any individual having actual knowledge of or reasonable cause to suspect an incident of ministry-related sexual abuse is to immediately report the incident to the Chancery.
2. The Chancery will then report the incident to the proper civil authorities. The individual reporting the incident to the Chancery will be notified of the particulars regarding the Chancery's filing of the incident with civil authorities.
3. This reporting requirement is not intended to supersede the right of an individual to make a report to civil authority, but is to ensure proper, complete and timely reporting. Should an individual choose to make a report to civil authority, a report is still to be made to the Chancery.

Build bridges, not walls

Obama, Mexican president both urged to care for migrants

BY PATRICIA ZAPOR
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

WASHINGTON — More than a week before he was to take office, President-elect Barack Obama met with Mexican President Felipe Calderon, prompting advice and recommendations about how the two leaders' governments should be handling immigration, among other matters.

Bishop John C. Wester of Salt Lake City, chairman of the U.S. Catholic bishops' migration committee, encouraged the two men to end abuses against migrants and put more effort into economic development to deter people from leaving their homelands.

"The issue of illegal immigration transcends borders and must be addressed on a regional, if not hemispheric level," Bishop Wester said in a statement released by the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops in Washington Jan. 12, the day Obama and Calderon met.

The bishop said the long-term solution to illegal immigration "is not militarization of the U.S.-Mexico border, but economic development in poor nations. At a minimum, U.S. trade and international economic policies should not contribute to this forced migration."

of Mexico before or soon after the inauguration of the U.S. president has become something of a tradition for the neighboring leaders.

Obama and Calderon held a private lunch at the Mexican Cultural Institute in Washington and met briefly with the press, describing their discussion only in general terms.

They said they talked about organized crime, immigration reform, the financial crisis, energy and other hemisphere issues. Calderon met with President George W. Bush the next day.

Obama was elected by a wide margin among Hispanic and immigrant voters and expectations are high for new approaches in dealing with immigration and policies that affect Latin American countries.

Bishop Wester's statement reminded the two leaders that "migrants risk their well-being and lives to migrate in order to find work and support their families — it is a decision made out of necessity, not choice."

He encouraged Obama and Calderon to "build bridges of cooperation, not walls of separation."

The bishop also referenced a joint 2003 statement by U.S. and Mexican bishops in which they said Mexico also must reform its immigration laws and policies, "so that migrants from Central and South America are not subject to exploitation."

Obama spokesman Robert Gibbs said the president-elect credited Calderon with improving security in Mexico and pledged further efforts, especially in the border states of both countries, to eliminate drug-related violence and stop the flow of guns and money.

Gibbs said the two men also talked about the North American Free Trade Agreement, with Obama saying he supports updating the agreement to strengthen labor and environmental provisions.

"President-elect Obama underscored his commitment to working with Congress to fix the broken U.S. immigration system and fostering safe, legal and orderly migration," he said.

"He expressed his strongly held view that immigrants should be treated with dignity and that the immigration debate should not be a vehicle for vilifying any group, and that our two countries need to work more effectively to stop the flow of illegal immigration into the United States," Gibbs said.

Human rights groups denounce police assault on migrants

MEXICO CITY (CNS) — Catholic leaders and human rights groups have condemned the actions of Chiapas state police accused of opening fire as they chased a truck carrying approximately 45 undocumented migrants.

The Jan. 9 incident left three migrants dead and six seriously injured near the Mexican-Guatemalan border, said the Chiapas-based Fray Bartolome de las Casas Human Rights Center.

The center said in a Jan. 11 report that police "indiscriminately fired" until the driver lost control and struck a tree. Migrants interviewed by the center denied allegations that shots were fired at state police members from the vehicle.

Bishop Felipe Arizmendi Esquivel of San Cristobal de Las Casas said the incidents of abuse against migrants crossing into southern Mexico, usually on their way to the United States, are common and that his diocese is building two new shelters to provide better assistance and protection.

Mexico's National Human Rights Commission announced Jan. 12 that it would open an investigation into police actions it called "arbitrary" and "excessive."

Criminal sanctions for being in Mexico without proper immigration documents were discarded last year, but observers say that migrants are still preyed upon by unscrupulous public officials while traveling through the country.

Silent No More

Campaign to show post-abortion grief is no longer forbidden

Abuse victims often use the phrase "silent no more" to indicate their response to being victimized.

It may be surprising to some in our society that as our nation reaches another anniversary of the abortion decisions Roe vs. Wade and Doe vs. Bolton, women from coast to coast are uniting under the banner of "Silent No More" because they have had abortions.

Not illegal "back alley" abortions, but abortions in legal "clinics."

These women do not consider themselves freed, empowered or ennobled because of their abortions. Rather, they testify that they were enslaved, weakened and wounded. They were, in short, given a false promise, which is the essence of all temptation.

They were told that this "procedure" would solve their problems. Instead, it brought more problems than they care to think about — namely, a whole range of physical and psychological wounds often described by the term "post-abortion syndrome."

What are these women doing to express their message? In Washington, D.C. and in cities across the country, they will gather publicly at rallies and prayer events and hold signs that say, "I Regret My Abortion." The Washington gathering will, in fact, be at the steps of the U.S. Supreme Court on the very date, Jan. 22, that abortion was legalized in the United States.

This campaign is organized worldwide by Priests for Life and Anglicans for Life, and is the largest mobilization ever of women and men who have lost children to abortion. Along with public gatherings, the men and women speak in legislative assemblies, in the media and in churches.

But why do this? If abortion is so painful, some will ask, why make a public display out of one's experience?

The answer is understood only if one knows how shameful and painful the silence of abortion is. The grief that follows abortion is, in the words of Dr. Theresa Burke, a "forbidden grief."

The grief is not acknowledged; it is not validated. People don't send sympathy cards or talk about it openly. In fact, those who grieve their children killed by abortion are often made to feel silly for feeling sad.

After all, they are told by society that they exercised a choice that solved a problem. Why grieve over that?

Such questions, of course, reveal a complete blindness to the fact that killing one's child hurts, and leaves a wound that Mom or Dad does not ever forget.

These men and women are tired of having pro-choice advocates pretend to speak for them. They want to tell the world, in their own words, that what is too easily celebrated as a "choice" and a "right" is in fact a painful burden.

Not every post-abortive person has found enough healing to be able to participate in these public rallies or hold these signs. But the participants in the Silent No More Awareness Campaign pray that their presence will assist their sisters and brothers on the road to healing, and give them some measure of comfort to know that their grief is no longer forbidden.

their care can hold on until they can be comforted by them.

And just as any caring father would, priests also discipline and teach the children under their care through the sacrament of reconciliation. And they bless them every time they come for Mass to receive the Body and Blood of Christ.

Our spiritual Fathers are on their knees constantly for all of us, their parish "children," to pray for our needs and concerns. They have legacies that live in the hearts of the faithful long after they are gone. So contrary to the way the world might see the Catholic priesthood — such as, a "giving up" of progeny — with the eyes of faith we can see that our Fathers have thousands of children. And they are called to love them all.

It was in this frame of mind that I heard the words during the consecration of the bread and wine: "This is my body,

No 'hooray' for Catholics in Congress

In Nancy Frazier O'Brien's article ("Catholic contingent: Number of Catholics in Congress edging up; more are Democrats," Jan. 9), one might assume that the products of our legislative branch would reflect more and more our Catholic values. Sadly, the opposite appears to be true.

While pointing out the Congress statistics, and that our vice-president elect and several of the incoming Cabinet nominees are Catholic, O'Brien conveys a "Hooray for the Catholics!" attitude. But perhaps more valuable would be an analysis of these Catholics' voting records on Catholic moral issues.

The scandalous attitude Catholic Democrat politicians have on abortion, euthanasia, homosexual unions and embryonic stem-cell research is shameful to the church and to Catholics who work tirelessly to uphold its teachings.

Until the Catholics in politics start representing the church's moral teachings consistently and publicly, they are nothing more than just secular voices in our nation's political machine. As the inevitable attempt for the passage of the Freedom of Choice Act moves closer, we must pray that our Catholic brethren in Congress remember how valuable life really is and vote accordingly. Only then can we collectively say "hooray" for our fellow Catholics in Congress.

I find it disheartening that our diocesan newspaper publishes a front-page article heralding the increased number of so-called "Catholics" in Congress, particularly in the Democratic Party ("Catholic contingent: Number of Catholics in Congress edging up; more are Democrats," Jan. 9).

What is the point of emphasizing that a large number of our congressional representatives are Catholic when they vote contrary to Catholic teaching with respect to the sanctity of life? Nowhere in the article does it mention that a significant number of them, especially those in leadership positions, have unabashedly supported abortion rights.

Bishops throughout our nation are fretting over the possibility that Congress will pass the Freedom of Choice Act, which will further embolden the culture of death that pervades this country.

If that bill becomes law, will The Catholic News & Herald highlight on page one the names of these so-called Catholic members of Congress who supported the legislation?

"Catholic contingent: Number of Catholics in Congress edging up; more are Democrats" (Jan. 9) does not take into consideration that all Catholics should be in conformity with the precepts of the Catholic Church.

Being a Catholic is not just based on being born and baptized; it is based on believing and practicing the Catholic faith. Those mentioned in the article have a "pick-and-choose" attitude toward Catholic teachings on topics such as abortion and same-sex marriage. How can they be respected when, for example, they ignore the efforts of practicing Catholics to defeat the scourge of abortion?

Peaceful solutions abound to conflict

In response to "Priest's message at Mass for peace: Gaza 'drowning in blood,'" (Jan. 9): As Catholics we should educate ourselves about the history of the ongoing conflict in the Middle East so we can have an objective view and not one influenced by the television and newspaper media telling us, about who our enemies and allies are.

We are accountable to God for the armchair wars we fight when God has told us to love our enemies. Our love for Christ, the Prince of Peace, should compel us to use whatever means we have — including protesting this senseless slaughter — so our country and the world will know that Catholics truly believe there are infinite peaceful solutions to every conflict in this world.

After a year and-a-half of trying, and praying many rosaries, my husband and I finally conceived — on the feast of the Immaculate Heart of Mary.

Every parent thinks his or her child is special, but we have hopes for a priestly vocation for our son. And when I expressed this to a friend, she quite offhandedly remarked, "Maybe by then priests will be able to marry and you can have grandchildren as well."

Facing an unknown future

Gleaming wisdom from past U.S. presidents

Barack Obama is not the first president of the United States to face a vastly unknown future as he pledges to lead the country with honor and trust, seeking to be a moral leader who can hopefully gain lasting respect both at home and abroad.

To refresh my memory, I have read the inaugural addresses of George Washington, Abraham Lincoln, Woodrow Wilson and Franklin D. Roosevelt — four presidents I believe were God-sent to Americans in perilous times.

Their words still inspire me.

On April 30, 1789, George Washington, humbly accepting the honor and responsibility of becoming the first president of the new nation, said his first “official act” was to “fervently” reach out to that “almighty Being who rules over the universe,” seeking “his benediction.”

Washington continued: “There is no truth more thoroughly established than that there exists in the economy and course of nature an indissoluble union between virtue and happiness; between duty and advantage; between the genuine maxims of an honest and magnanimous policy and the solid rewards of public prosperity and felicity. ...

“The propitious smiles of heaven can never be expected on a nation that disregards the eternal rules of order and right which heaven itself has ordained.”

Then, confidently, he underscored that “the preservation of the sacred fire of liberty and the destiny of the republican model of government are justly ... staked on the experiment entrusted to the hands of the American people.”

Washington expressed not just our destiny, but our challenge!

On March 4, 1861, Abraham Lincoln gave his first inaugural address, acknowledging the turbulence between the North and the South, saying, “One section of our country believes slavery is right and ought to be extended, while the other believes it is wrong and ought not to be extended. ...

“In your hands, my dissatisfied fellow-countrymen, and not in mine, is the momentous issue of civil war. The government will not assail you. You can have no conflict without being yourselves the aggressors. You have no oath registered in heaven to destroy the government, while I shall have the most solemn one to ‘preserve, protect and defend it.’”

And then Lincoln predicted that the Union would prevail when all are again touched “by the better angels of our nature.”

On March 4, 1913, Woodrow Wilson, a Democrat, was elected president after many years of Republican rule. His inaugural address didn’t sit well with many.

He said, “The great government we loved has too often been made use of for private and selfish purposes, and those who used it had forgotten the people.”

The Bottom Line

ANTOINETTE BOSCO
CNS COLUMNIST

Then, emphasizing that government must be put “at the service of humanity,” and that this is not a “sentimental duty,” he underscored, “The firm basis of government is justice, not pity.”

On March 4, 1933, Franklin D. Roosevelt inherited the job of leading the United States when practically every bank had been closed, 13 million people were unemployed, many industries had ceased to operate and the agrarian economy was at an all-time low.

His words were honest: “Only a foolish optimist can deny the dark realities of the moment.”

Bravely, he challenged Americans: “These dark days will be worth all they cost us if they teach us that our true destiny is not to be ministered unto, but to minister to ourselves and to our fellow men.”

And now, President Barack Obama’s inaugural address will also become history.

May God bless him with truth and wisdom.

United with Christ, people have nothing, no one to fear, pope says

The Pope Speaks

POPE BENEDICT XVI

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — While people lacking faith in God may dread numerous dangers and hostile forces in the world, those who are firmly united with Christ have nothing and no one to fear, Pope Benedict XVI said.

Jesus Christ is above every form of domination and “he is the true Lord of the world,” the pope said Jan. 14 at his weekly general audience.

With an estimated 4,000 people gathered inside the Paul VI hall, Pope Benedict continued his audience talks about the life and teaching of St. Paul, focusing on the theme of Christ as the head of the church and the universe.

In his letters to the Colossians and to the Ephesians, St. Paul gives Christians an enormously positive and important message: that Christ is above “every form of power that might aim to humiliate the human being,” said the pope.

Here is the text of the pope’s audience remarks in English.

My favorite quotes

Words of wisdom from throughout history

At the Last Supper, Jesus said, “I have told you this so that my joy might be in you and your joy might be complete” (Jn 15:11).

Victor Hugo (1802-1885), the great French writer, didn’t believe in God for most of his life, but in his later years he wrote: “The supreme happiness of life is the conviction that we are loved.”

Blessed Elizabeth of the Trinity, a 19th-century Carmelite nun, explained, “The secret of happiness, and the secret of all the saints, is that they loved God as friend.”

Rosa Baines from Edmonton, Canada, said, “I have at times wondered whether God allows sorrow and pain into our lives so that we can truly appreciate the times of happiness and joy ... a sunrise or sunset, birds soaring, flowers blooming, celebrating Christmas with family and friends, attending weddings or baptisms, or just watching children play.”

Blessed Julian of Norwich: “The Lord wants us to rejoice in the fullness of joy. He, who will be our bliss when we are in heaven, is our protection while we are here on our way. ... Let us flee to the Lord, and we shall be comforted. Let us touch him and we shall be made clean.”

Dietrich Bonhoeffer (1906-1945), the Lutheran theologian and martyr who opposed the Nazi movement in Germany, commented: “Nothing can make up for the absence of someone you love. ... The dearer and richer the memories might be, the more difficult the separation.

“But gratitude changes the pangs of memory into tranquil joy. The beauties of the past are borne, not as a thorn in the flesh but as a precious gift.”

Cardinal Leo Jozef Suenens wrote: “The Holy Spirit comes like a great wind; it is we who must adjust our sails.”

St. Francis de Sales counseled: “Do not fear what may happen tomorrow. The same loving Father who cares for you today will care for you tomorrow and every day.

“Either he will shield you from suffering or he will give you unflinching strength to bear it. Be at peace then, and put aside all anxious thoughts and imaginings.”

St. Teresa of Avila taught: “Trust the past to God’s mercy and the future to God’s divine providence.”

Henry Ward Beecher observed: “The sun does not shine for a few trees and flowers, but for the whole wide world’s joy.”

At a general audience in April 2002, Pope John Paul II addressed the pilgrims with these words: “The need for God is a need that can be as physical as the need for food and water. Just as the arid land is dead until irrigated by rain, so the faithful yearn for God in order to exist in joyful communion with him.”

In his Advent meditations, Pope John Paul wrote: “Christ came to bring joy; joy to children, joy to parents, joy to families and friends, joy to workers and scholars, joy to the sick and elderly, joy to all humanity. In a true sense joy is the keynote message of Christianity and the recurring motif of the Gospels. Go therefore and become messengers of joy.”

Jesus, throughout his public ministry, taught us to cheer up: “In the world you will have trouble, but take courage, I have conquered the world” (Jn 16:33).

The simplicity of his statement is disarming, but you must believe him when he says, “Your grief will become joy” (Jn 16:20).

Dear Brothers and Sisters,

Continuing our catechesis on St. Paul, we turn to the “twin” letters: Colossians and Ephesians. Similar in language, they are unique in developing the theme of Christ as “head” — kephalé — not only of the church, but also of the entire universe.

These letters assure us that Christ is above any hostile earthly power. Christ alone “loved us and gave himself up for us” (Eph 5:2), so that if we remain close to him, we need not fear any adversity. It was God’s plan to “recapitulate” all things in Jesus “through whom all things were created,” so that “by the blood of his cross” we might be reconciled to the Father.

Christ’s headship also implies that, in a certain sense, he is greater than the church in that his dominion extends beyond her boundaries, and that the church, rather than the entire cosmos, is referred to as the Body of Christ.

These letters are also notable for the spousal image they use to describe how Christ has “won” his bride — the church — by giving his life for her (cf. Eph 5:25). What greater sign of love could there be than this?

Christ thus desires that we grow more beautiful each day through irreproachable moral conduct, “without wrinkle or defect” (Eph 5:27).

By living uprightly and justly, may we bear witness to the nuptial union which has already taken place in Christ as we await its fulfillment in the wedding feast to come.

Pope Benedict XVI baptizes one of 13 infants in the Sistine Chapel at the Vatican Jan. 11.

Bridging the path of grace

Pope baptizes infants, emphasizes parents' formation role

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — In an annual liturgy, Pope Benedict XVI baptized 13 infants and emphasized the duty of parents and godparents to educate them in the faith.

The pope strongly defended the practice of infant baptism, saying it acts as a "bridge" between human beings and God, and helps lead children along the path of grace.

The Mass Jan. 11 marked the feast of the Baptism of the Lord. The pontiff celebrated the liturgy in the Sistine Chapel, where the crying of babies reverberated off the frescoed walls and ceiling.

The pope poured water from a shell-shaped dipper onto the head of each of the 13 infants — nine boys and four girls, the children of Vatican employees.

In his sermon, the pope said parents should consider children not as their personal property to be shaped according to their own ideas and desires, but as free children of God who need to be educated in order to make the right choices in life.

Infant baptism, he told parents, does no violence to children, but rather introduces them into "a new family, greater and more stable, and more open and numerous than your own."

"Baptism is in a sense the bridge that God has built between himself and us, the road by which he makes himself accessible to us," he said.

"It is the divine rainbow over our lives, the promise of God's great 'yes,' the door of hope and, at the same time, the sign that shows us the path to walk," he said.

As in the same liturgy the previous year, Pope Benedict celebrated Mass at the chapel's original fixed altar that stands against the wall covered by Michelangelo's fresco of "The Last Judgment." That meant that during parts of the Mass the pope was turned away from the people.

Later, at his noon talk to pilgrims in St. Peter's Square, the pope spoke about baptism as a moment of joy and a great gift.

"If we fully realized this, our lives would be a continual grace," he said.

At the same time, he said, baptism implies a serious responsibility for parents and for godparents, who must educate their children according to the Gospel.

Church leaders reaffirm traditional family at meeting in Mexico

MEXICO CITY (CNS) — Participants at the Sixth World Meeting of Families made impassioned defenses of the traditional family while rejecting allegations from protesters and local leftist politicians that the Catholic Church has been preaching exclusion.

Speakers on the first day of the Jan. 14-18 meeting, which organizers say is being attended by more than 8,000 participants from more than 90 countries, emphasized the traditional definition of family — father, mother and children — while discarding suggestions that the institution be expanded to include homosexual couples. The meeting was organized by the Vatican's Pontifical Council for the Family.

"The church — we teach respect for marriage between a man and a woman because that is the foundation of the family," Cardinal Norberto Rivera Carrera of Mexico City said during his opening remarks Jan. 14.

His comments at the five-day meeting were echoed by other speakers, including Cardinal Marc Ouellet of Quebec City, who said during a discussion on values, "Marriage and the family have turned into a battlefield, where secularization is attempting to injure the family."

The meeting of families has provoked some controversy in Mexico City, where the local government has been liberalizing laws on abortion, euthanasia and same-sex unions over the past two years.

A small left-wing party famed for championing contentious social issues protested outside the convention center, saying that the meeting only promoted one family model.

Mexican President Felipe Calderon, who inaugurated the meeting, also raised some eyebrows as Mexican leaders traditionally have avoided publicly being seen at large church events.

Father Jose Aguilar, director of radio and TV for the Archdiocese of Mexico City, told Catholic News Service that the president's appearance simply showed an increased tolerance for the church on the part of public officials.

Regarding the protesters, he explained that Cardinal Rivera had given a written response to the Social Democratic Party, known as the PSD, on the subject of family diversity.

Father Aguilar added that the meeting of families was being attended by many non-Catholics, including the Mexican heads of non-Christian faiths.

Vatican Embassy in Venezuela attacked with tear-gas bombs

CARACAS, Venezuela (CNS) — The Vatican Embassy in Caracas was attacked with tear-gas bombs amid rising tensions over a vote to amend the constitution, Catholic officials said.

The six bombs, thrown at 5:30 a.m. Jan. 19, caused no injuries, but generated an angry protest from Archbishop Roberto Luckert Leon of Coro, vice president of the Venezuelan bishops' conference, who called the act "an abuse."

"They're trying to create a climate of violence and generate fear in everybody who dissents" from the government of President Hugo Chavez, Archbishop Luckert said.

He also said the government was not fulfilling its obligation to protect the embassy, or nunciature.

Those who threw the tear-gas bombs left leaflets from a pro-Chavez activist group accused of attacking a television station and the home of a journalist critical of the government.

On Feb. 15, Venezuelans will vote on a government-proposed constitutional amendment that would remove term limits for all elected officials. Catholic Church leaders, who have long accused Chavez of concentrating too much power in the presidency, have criticized the proposed amendment.

The nunciature is also housing an opposition student leader, Nixon Moreno, who is seeking political asylum overseas. Venezuelan officials want to try Moreno as a common criminal.

After the tear-gas bombing, Moreno's attorney, Tamara Suju, said that the canisters had come from CAVIM, the military's official arms supplier.

"How is it possible that armed paramilitary groups acting with impunity in the country have weapons issued by CAVIM?" she asked. "We demand answers from the Venezuelan state."

Pope expresses hope for Gaza truce, resumption of dialogue

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Pope Benedict XVI said he hoped a fragile cease-fire in the Gaza Strip would be the first step toward serious negotiations for a lasting peace in the Holy Land.

The pope made the remarks at his noon blessing at the Vatican Jan. 18. The same day, the Palestinian militant organization Hamas said it would stop rocket attacks so that Israel could withdraw its troops from Gaza after a deadly three-week offensive.

The pope offered prayers for "the hundreds of children, elderly and women, the innocent victims of unheard-of violence, the wounded, those mourning their loved ones and who have lost their possessions."

At least 1,300 Palestinians were killed in the offensive, many of them civilians, according to Palestinian sources. Israel reported the deaths of 13 people, including three civilians. Thousands of buildings in Gaza were destroyed in the bombardment.

The pope asked leaders on both sides to "help their people rise up from the ruins and from terror and courageously resume the path of dialogue in justice and truth."

The Vatican announced Jan. 17 that the pope was sending a cash gift to aid relief efforts carried out by the small Catholic community in Gaza, including Blessed Mother Teresa's Missionaries of Charity.

A Vatican statement said church personnel in Gaza were serving the most vulnerable people in the Holy Land, who were "being tragically scourged by death, human pain, material damage and tears that cry out for peace."

Vatican cardinal hopes Italian Jews return to dialogue day

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — A Vatican official said it was "a worrisome sign" that Italian Jewish leaders opted out of the annual Day of Catholic-Jewish Dialogue over the wording of a Good Friday prayer.

"We hope they will return to a serious dialogue," Cardinal Walter Kasper told Vatican Radio Jan. 17. The cardinal heads the Pontifical Council for Promoting Christian Unity.

"They are protesting against a so-called 'superiority' of Christians, but I have to say the word 'superiority' is not part of our terminology. We say the Old Testament, which we have in common, is fulfilled by the New Testament and by Jesus Christ — but this is a position we have always had," the cardinal said.

In November, members of the Italian Rabbinical Assembly said they would not co-sponsor the annual Day of Catholic-Jewish Dialogue. The rabbinical assembly and the Italian bishops' conference have together sponsored the Jan. 17 dialogue day since 1990.

The Jewish leaders objected to a Good Friday prayer revised by Pope Benedict XVI for use only at services following the 1962 Roman Missal. The revised prayer says: "Let us pray for the Jews. May the Lord our God enlighten their hearts so that they may acknowledge Jesus Christ, the savior of all men."

The second line of the prayer reads: "Almighty and everlasting God, you who want all men to be saved and to reach the awareness of the truth, graciously grant that, as the full number of the gentiles comes into your church, all Israel may be saved."

In early January, Rabbi Elia Enrico Richetti, the chief rabbi of Venice, wrote in a magazine article that the prayer, which seemed to call for the conversion of Jews, showed a lack of respect and was an obstacle to authentic dialogue.

In his interview with Vatican Radio, Cardinal Kasper said that, although Christians and Jews were divided on the issue of Christology, Catholics respected the beliefs of Jews. He underlined that the only place where dialogue had been interrupted was in Italy.

The cardinal also said that, while dialogue was useful, it was even more important for the two faiths to demonstrate common values in today's secularized society when it comes to issues like the family, human rights, peace and justice.

Mozart and memories

Pope Benedict XVI greets his brother, Msgr. Georg Ratzinger, during a concert of Mozart music for the priest's 85th birthday in the Sistine Chapel at the Vatican Jan. 17. The music was performed by the Regensburg Boys' Choir, which Msgr. Ratzinger had directed for some 30 years, the Regensburg cathedral orchestra and guest soloists.

The pope reminisced about how his brother took him to Salzburg, Austria, almost 70 years ago to hear a Mozart Mass. The same Mozart composition, his Mass in C Minor, was performed in the Sistine Chapel. Pope Benedict said that although he was a 14-year-old boy when he and his brother first heard the Mozart Mass performed, "I understood that we experienced something other than a simple concert, that it was music at prayer, the divine office, in which we almost could touch something of the magnificence and beauty of God himself, and we were touched."

The thanksgiving to God expressed in the Mozart Mass "is not a superficial gratitude given lightly," the pope said, but is wholehearted and reflects Mozart's "interior struggle, his search for forgiveness, the mercy of God and, then, from these depths, his joy in God shines more brightly than ever."

Catholics take part in Raleigh March for Life

RALEIGH — Parishioners from the Diocese of Charlotte took part in the Raleigh Rally and March for Life Jan. 17.

Raleigh Bishop Michael F. Burbidge participated in the march, which took pro-life advocates through the streets of Raleigh past the state capital building.

Earlier that day, Bishop Burbidge celebrated a Mass for life at St. Joseph Church in Raleigh.

In his homily, Bishop Burbidge acknowledged that some people believe the prayer services and rallies for life, such as those held in Washington, D.C., to mark the 36th anniversary of the U.S. Supreme Court's Roe v. Wade decision Jan. 22, are "a source of division and obstacles to the positive climate needed in our country."

The bishop said that view was not correct. "We can see a world in which all of human life is revered and all persons are respected," said Bishop Burbidge, "a world in which there are no abortions, no euthanasia, no assisted suicide, no deep freezing of embryos as though they were merchandise, no destruction of human life in the name of science, no death penalty and no unjust treatment of the immigrant or of any other person."

Bishop Burbidge said there is reason to be filled with hope, noting the recent statistics that indicate more Americans are becoming pro-life.

"As faithful citizens and disciples of Christ, we rally for life, we pray for life and we march for life," he said.

Bishop Burbidge and Charlotte Bishop Peter J. Jugis participated in the Washington March for Life. Look for coverage in the next edition of The Catholic News & Herald.

with a great turnout," said Tina Witt, a parishioner of St. Patrick Cathedral in Charlotte who organized the march.

Participants gathered in the parking lot of the diocesan Pastoral Center on South Church Street. From there, they marched down Tryon Street, distributing rosaries and pro-life reading materials to passersby along the way.

"It is something that we need to do as people who are pro-life," said Seth Dobson, chairman of Charlotte Right to Life.

"It keeps the issue out there and emphasizes the importance of building a culture of life in our state," he said.

The march stopped for a brief rally at the corner of Trade and Tryon streets, which featured an address from Father Timothy Reid, pastor of St. Ann Church in Charlotte.

"Almost 50 million American babies have died in the wombs of their mothers" since abortion was legalized in the United States in 1973, said Father Reid.

"We do not have to put up with abortion," he said. "Today we are a visible witness to our hope and our convictions."

"We are never without hope because our trust is in God," he added.

Following Father Reid's address, a brief talk was given by a representative from Silent No More, a national campaign devoted to exposing and healing the secrecy and silence surrounding the emotional and physical pain of abortion.

And to conclude the rally, approximately 15 children huddled around a microphone to chant Ave Maria in front of the crowd.

From the rally at the square, marchers proceeded through uptown Charlotte to the Charles R. Jonas Federal Building on Trade Street, which houses the courthouse.

"All of us here today are going to be signs of hope to our society," said Bishop Peter J. Jugis who joined the marchers in praying the rosary and the Chaplet of Divine Mercy in

"We are sending a hopeful message of life and love," the bishop said.

"There is a better choice" than abortion, he said. "That is love; that is life."

FROM THE COVER

U.S.-Vatican relations mark silvery anniversary

the dinner when she read from an 1865 letter that described Rome as the perfect listening post.

At that time, the secretary of the U.S. legation to the Papal States wrote to his superiors in Washington and asked for a bigger budget so he could give "small but frequent entertainments" to other diplomats and the Monsignors heading Vatican departments.

"European diplomacy is carried on by dinners and parties — you gather information this way to be obtained in no other manner," he wrote.

A glance around the embassy's banquet tables found clerical and diplomatic guests nodding in assent.

But if the idea of having a full-time ambassador stationed at the Vatican seems like a no-brainer, that hasn't always been the case.

In 1984, President Ronald Reagan's decision to move from an on-again, off-again "personal envoy" to full-fledged diplomatic relations was controversial, to say the least.

Baptists, Seventh-day Adventists and Protestant organizations criticized the move. Complaints came from Americans United for Separation of Church and State, and even the National Council of Churches.

The late Rev. Jerry Falwell, who headed the Moral Majority movement, reacted by asking how long it would be before a similar request came from Mecca, the chief holy city of Islam.

And of course, lawsuits were filed, although they were eventually dismissed.

Natural allies

The traditional argument against U.S.-Vatican relations was that the Vatican — technically, the "Holy See" — was first and foremost a church, not a state, and should not be privileged by a diplomatic presence.

President Franklin Roosevelt appointed the first envoy to the Vatican just before World War II. But when President Harry Truman tried to appoint a successor in 1951, he was met with a storm of protest, and the post went vacant for nearly 20 years.

Reagan's decision to elevate the position to ambassador was considered a courageous one that might cost him politically.

It wasn't long before most of the criticism faded. One big reason was that under Pope John Paul II, who was a strong critic of East European communism, U.S. and Vatican interests were seen to coincide.

It wasn't just a matter of moral support, but information-sharing as well.

At one crucial moment in history, a few hours after a papal meeting with Soviet President Mikhail Gorbachev in 1989, the Vatican told the United States in a confidential assessment that Gorbachev could be trusted as a genuine reformer.

The late pope's high profile as a defender of human rights and human dignity, along with his frequent trips to the United States, also made the Vatican seem more like a natural ally and less like a foreign planet.

After the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, the Vatican's qualified support for a U.S. military response in Afghanistan had embassy employees handing out pins with the U.S. and Vatican flags.

Today, the United States has one of the biggest and most active embassies to the Holy See and has launched cooperative projects with the Vatican in areas like human trafficking and religious freedom.

Occasional clashes

There have been rough spots, too, most of them in the international arena.

As he attended Christmas midnight Mass in 1989, U.S. Ambassador Thomas Melady was called out of St. Peter's Basilica by his aides and told that Panamanian dictator Manuel Noriega had escaped U.S. troops and taken refuge in the Vatican's nunciature in Panama City.

Melady then passed a handwritten note during the liturgy to Cardinal Agostino Casaroli, Vatican secretary of state, opening a delicate round of negotiations that lasted 10 days and ended in Noriega's surrender.

The administration of President Bill Clinton clashed with the Vatican over international policies on population control and abortion — a rift that U.S. Ambassador Raymond Flynn, a Catholic, was unable to mend.

The launchings of the two Iraqi wars, in 1991 and in 2003, were probably the toughest trials for U.S.-Vatican diplomacy.

Pope John Paul was strongly against military intervention in both cases; in 2003, he sent a personal envoy, Cardinal Pio Laghi, to try to convince President George W. Bush to avoid war.

Cardinal Laghi met with Bush but felt the president had already made up his mind to invade Iraq. The cardinal was strongly critical of the U.S. decision to go to war and made no bones about saying so in later years.

Yet Cardinal Laghi, who had been the first apostolic nuncio to the United States in the 1980s, considered himself a great friend of the United States. In some ways he was a symbol of the good times and hard times in U.S.-Vatican relations.

Cardinal Laghi died at age 86 Jan. 10 — at almost the precise moment when, 25 years earlier, the United States and the Vatican announced the establishment of diplomatic relations.

Before the start of the U.S. Embassy dinner marking the silver anniversary, participants marked his passing with a moment of silent prayer.

A new door opening

Tuskegee airman comes to Washington to witness historic inauguration

BY RICHARD SZCZEPANOWSKI
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

WASHINGTON — Among the millions who braved the cold to watch as President Barack Obama made history by becoming this nation's first African-American president was a Catholic deacon who made history himself some 60 years ago.

Deacon Walt Richardson, who will turn 80 in February, was a special guest at the new president's inauguration because he was one of the famed Tuskegee Airmen.

"I think of the awesome responsibility he is accepting," Deacon Richardson said of the new president.

"I feel a sense of pride for our country and for him. What brings joy to me is the opportunity to live this moment, to see the inauguration of this president," he said.

Deacon Richardson — a friend of Washington Auxiliary Bishop Martin D. Holley who knew the prelate when he was a priest at St. Mary Church in Fort Walton Beach, Fla. — traveled to Washington for the inauguration along with Helen, his wife of 56 years.

Richardson's daughter, Donna Richardson, is a parishioner and cantor at St. Gabriel Church in Charlotte. Richardson has sung with his daughter at Mass when visiting Charlotte.

Distinguished service

The Tuskegee Airmen were African-

American men who joined the service during World War II, a time of racial segregation in society and the military. The men had to fight discrimination in order to fight for their country.

The aviation cadets were trained at Tuskegee Army Airfield in Alabama in a variety of disciplines, including single- and twin-engine aviation, navigation, meteorology, operational intelligence, medicine, aircraft mechanics, radio repair, parachute rigging, and other jobs required by the squadron.

Members of the group fought with distinction during the war, but faced discrimination when they returned home.

Deacon Richardson served with the Tuskegee Airmen not as an aviator or mechanic, but as an entertainer.

"I was part of 'Operation Happiness,'" Deacon Richardson said. "I was a singer, and we were the first all-military troupe to entertain at Air Force bases."

After a year with the Tuskegee Airmen, Deacon Richardson was transferred to an all-white unit. There, he said, he faced racism and had to "readjust in order to fit in."

He said that with the Tuskegee Airmen he did not have to worry about matters such as which water fountain he was allowed to drink from.

Deacon Richardson, who joined the Catholic Church in 1957, recalled encountering racism during a 1958 trip he made cross-country when he was transferred from Eglin Air Base in Florida to Okinawa, Japan. As he was driving to the West Coast for deployment, he had trouble finding motels and hotels that would accept black customers.

"My first reaction was to turn to my faith. Whenever I came to a town (to spend the night), I stopped at a Catholic church to ask the priest to recommend a place to stay that would accept my family and me," he said. "The priests would always find me a place."

He said he also had trouble finding places to eat.

"If I noticed there was no back door, I would go in through the front door by myself," he recalled. "If I was not challenged, then I knew I could bring my family in. This is what I went through even though I was a technical sergeant in the Air Force."

Despite the hardships the squadron faced, the history it made and the victories it won, Deacon Richardson said the members were first and foremost dedicated to serving their country.

"We took care of business and did the job we had to do," he said.

During his 40 years with the Air Force, Deacon Richardson served for a time in Vietnam. While stationed at the Dover (Del.) Air Force Base, he became the first African-American to be promoted to master sergeant in the field maintenance squadron.

Enduring faith

Deacon Richardson has served as a permanent deacon for 29 years. He and his wife have eight children and nine grandchildren.

He recently finished a book about his life story entitled "How Great Thou Art: A Black Boy's Depression-era Success Story."

He saw attending the inauguration of Obama as "another door that has been opened, and I am ready for it."

"I never thought I would see this day. I never ever dreamed I would live to see this day, even though I had hopes," Deacon Richardson said.

His teachers always told him and his classmates if they studied hard, worked hard, were good and served the Lord "we could grow up to be president of the United States," he said.

"That is what we heard, but we let it roll off our shoulders, because we really didn't believe it," he said.

Seeing the first African-American president, Deacon Richardson said, has deepened "my commitment to God and to others."

"God is great enough, and if we trust in him, he will take care of the rest," he said.

"We're still struggling to prove our identity, and in due time God will prove the opportunities. I don't know how long God is going to leave me here, but I intend to make a difference," he said.

Catholic colleges, parishes host guests attending inauguration, balls

WASHINGTON (CNS) — The campus of Trinity Washington University has been the site of much activity.

For four days, the Catholic campus hosted more than 400 members of the National Guard who were part of the security and crowd management personnel for the inaugural events.

The university also hosted Jan. 19-21 more than 60 students from Spelman College in Atlanta who attended the inauguration of Barack Obama Jan. 20.

The Spelman students planned to join Trinity students in a campus inaugural gala, "A Celebration of Change," on Trinity's campus the same day.

The Catholic University of America, down the street from Trinity, hosted an inaugural ball Jan. 16.

At least two Catholic parishes in the Washington area also hosted inaugural balls — Our Lady of Perpetual Help Church in Washington and St. Margaret Church in Seat Pleasant, Md.

Approximately 400 people planned to celebrate the new president taking office at Our Lady of Perpetual Help Church's ball.

"This will be the beginning of an incredible chapter in the annals of our American history," said Josephite Father William Norvel, pastor. "All of us are now called to wrap President (Barack) Obama and his administration in prayer that the work the Lord has begun in him will be brought to perfection."

The priest said knee trouble prevented him from attending the inauguration in person but he planned to watch "every minute of it" on television.

Like other members of his parish, he had family members in town for the inauguration. He said there was "tremendous excitement" in the air.

"We're overjoyed an African-American is taking a position of top leadership," he said, noting that many parishioners wanted to attend the inauguration to "be part of the celebration" and they wanted their children there to "experience the joy."

life-related matters, the president of the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops told him in a new letter.

Such actions "could introduce significant negative and divisive factors into our national life, at a time when we need to come together to address the serious challenges facing our people," said Cardinal Francis E. George of Chicago in a letter dated Jan. 16 and made public Jan. 19.

The letter came less than a week after Cardinal George sent another letter to Obama, Vice President Joseph Biden and each member of Congress outlining the bishops' broad policy agenda as the new administration and Congress begin their work.

"I expect that some want you to take executive action soon to reverse current policies against government-sponsored destruction of unborn human life," Cardinal George said.

"I urge you to consider that this could be a terrible mistake — morally, politically and in terms of advancing the solidarity and well-being of our nation's people," he said.

Specifically, the USCCB president mentioned the recently issued Department of Health and Human Services regulation protecting the conscience rights of health care providers and institutions; the so-called Mexico City policy barring the use of U.S. family planning funds to promote or perform abortions in developing nations; and current embryonic stem-cell policy prohibiting federal funding of research involving embryonic stem-cell lines created after 2001.

Cardinal George said he hoped the new president would "consider these comments in the spirit in which they are intended, as an invitation to set aside political pressures and ideologies and focus on the priorities and challenges that will unite us as a nation."

"Again I want to express our hopes for your administration, and our offer to cooperate in advancing the common good and protecting the poor and vulnerable in these challenging times," he added.

The cardinal noted that during his campaign Obama "spoke often about a need to reduce abortions" and had said he had no definite answer when asked at what point a baby has human rights.

"I think your remarks provide a basis for common ground," Cardinal George said.

"Uncertainty as to when human rights begin provides no basis for compelling others to violate their conviction that these rights exist from the beginning. After all, those people may be right," he said.

"And if the goal is to reduce abortions, that will not be achieved by involving the government in expanding and promoting abortions," he added.

Commenting specifically on the HHS conscience guarantees, Cardinal George said the regulation was "a long-overdue measure for implementing three statutes enacted by Congress over the last 35 years."

"An administration committed to faithfully implementing and enforcing the laws of the United States will want to retain this common-sense regulation, which explicitly protects the rights of health professionals who favor or oppose abortion to serve the basic health needs of their communities," he said.

"Suggestions that government involvement in health care will be aimed at denying conscience, or excluding Catholic and other health care providers from participation in serving the public good, could threaten much-needed health care reform at the outset," the cardinal added.

He said the Mexico City policy, first implemented in 1984, "has wrongly been attacked as a restriction on foreign aid for family planning" but instead ensures that family planning funds "are not diverted to organizations dedicated to performing and promoting abortions instead of reducing them."

"Once the clear line between family planning and abortion is erased, the idea of using family planning to reduce abortions becomes meaningless, and abortion tends to replace contraception as the means for reducing family size," said the cardinal's letter to Obama.

On embryonic stem-cell research, Cardinal George said "recent startling advances in reprogramming adult cells," along with progress in research using adult and cord-blood stem cells, make any change in current policy "especially pointless."

"To divert scarce funds away from these promising avenues for research and treatment toward the avenue that is most morally controversial as well as most medically speculative would be a sad victory of politics over science," he said.

Pope Benedict XVI congratulates Obama

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Pope Benedict XVI, congratulating Barack Obama on his inauguration as U.S. president, prayed that he would remain steadfast in his dedication to promote understanding, cooperation and peace in the world.

The pope, in a Jan. 20 telegram, told Obama that he prayed God would "grant you unfailing wisdom and strength in the exercise of your high responsibilities."

Pope Benedict said he prayed, under the new president's leadership, that "the American people continue to find in their impressive religious and political heritage the spiritual values and ethical principles needed to cooperate in the building of a truly just and free society."

The pope said he hoped the future of the United States would be "marked by respect for the dignity, equality and rights of each of its members, especially the poor, the outcast and those who have no voice."

"At a time when so many of our brothers and sisters throughout the world yearn for liberation from the scourge of poverty, hunger and violence, I pray that you will be confirmed in your resolve to promote understanding, cooperation and peace among the nations, so that all may share in the banquet of life which God wills to set for the whole human family."

President-elect Barack Obama walks out to take the Oath of Office as the 44th president of the United States in Washington Jan. 20.

Nation's religious heritage 'a strength,' says Obama and Hindus — and nonbelievers,” Obama said. “We are shaped by every language and culture, drawn from every end of this earth.”

“And because we have tasted the bitter swill of Civil War and segregation, and emerged from that dark chapter stronger and more united, we cannot help but believe that the old hatreds shall someday pass; that the lines of tribe shall soon dissolve; that as the world grows smaller, our common humanity shall reveal itself; and that America must play its role in ushering in a new era of peace,” he continued.

Obama acknowledged the challenges facing the country throughout his 2,400-word address, delivered before a throng at the Capitol and stretching forth on the National Mall. It was believed to be the largest single gathering of people in Washington history.

“Our challenges may be new. The instruments with which we meet them may be new,” Obama said. “But those values upon which our success depends — hard work and honesty, courage and fair play, tolerance and curiosity, loyalty and patriotism — these things are old. These things are true. They have been the quiet force of progress throughout our history.”

So “what is demanded,” the new president said, “is a return to these truths.”

“What is required of us now is a new era of responsibility — a recognition, on the part of every American, that we have duties to ourselves, our nation and the world,” he said.

These are duties “we do not grudgingly accept but rather seize gladly, firm in the knowledge that there is nothing so satisfying to the spirit, so defining of our character, than giving our all to a difficult task. This is the price and the promise of citizenship,” he said.

“This is the source of our confidence — the knowledge that God calls on us to shape an uncertain destiny,” he said.

Bold, swift action

Regarding the economy, Obama said the situation “calls for action, bold and swift, and we will act — not only to create new jobs, but to lay a new foundation for growth.”

“We will build the roads and bridges, the electric grids and digital lines that feed our commerce and bind us together,” he continued. “We will restore science to its rightful place, and wield technology’s wonders to raise health care’s quality and lower its cost.”

“We will harness the sun and the winds and the soil to fuel our cars and run our factories. And we will transform our schools and colleges and universities to meet the demands of a new age. All this we can do. And all this we will do,” he said.

“God calls on us to shape an uncertain destiny.”

— President Barack Obama

Obama said that “there are some who question the scale of our ambitions — who suggest that our system cannot tolerate too many big plans.”

But “their memories are short,” he said. “For they have forgotten what this country has already done, what free men and women can achieve when imagination is joined to common purpose, and necessity to courage.”

The crowds in downtown Washington cheered shortly after noon when people realized Obama had been inaugurated. People waved flags, started shouting “Obama! Obama!” and whistled as news filtered down Pennsylvania Avenue that the former senator of Illinois was now president.

Prayerful guidance

Before the inauguration ceremony, Obama and then-Vice President-elect Joseph Biden Jr. and their wives took part in a morning prayer service at St. John’s Episcopal Church, across from the White House.

The sermon at the private service was delivered by Bishop T.D. Jakes, pastor of the Potter’s House megachurch in Dallas and more recently a writer and producer of films.

Obama and Biden then went to the White House for a coffee with their predecessors, President George W. Bush and Vice President Richard Cheney.

The day before, both Obama and Biden joined volunteers in various service projects on the national observance of the Rev. Martin Luther King Jr. birthday holiday, which was designated as a national day of service.

Biden worshipped and received Communion Jan. 18 at Holy Trinity Church in the Georgetown neighborhood of Washington. His granddaughter had received her first Communion at the same church in 2008.

Jesuit Father Larry Madden’s homily, according to The Associated Press, focused on God as a constant anchor and the promise of hope and change for those who believe. The assembly was asked to pray for “wisdom and integrity” to guide the new president and his administration.

Holy Trinity is the same church where President John F. Kennedy worshipped while in Washington, including a morning Mass Jan. 20, 1961, before his own swearing-in.

Authors explore why 'doing the right thing' can be so hard

Why does God ask certain things of his sons and daughters?

According to Father Thomas D. Williams in his book "Knowing Right From Wrong," "God did not sit down one day to invent the Ten Commandments to make our lives difficult. God does not command honesty, justice, temperance and religion because he feels like it, but because they are truly good for us."

Father Williams, a member of the Legionaries of Christ, delves into the many facets of human nature, exploring the almost infinite variety of reasons why choosing to "do the wrong thing" is so tempting.

Though the subject is lofty, Father Williams grasps each rung of the ladder carefully and surely.

In a chapter titled "That Still, Small Voice," he takes on the immutability of right and wrong. There are, he says, things such as fixed standards:

"We have the power to choose right or wrong — but we do not have the power to declare what is right or wrong and have it be so. ... Certain things are the way they are despite our opinions or personal wishes, and this is true in our moral lives as well."

He ventures into seriously Orwellian territory when he defines true freedom (it requires the government of reason and will; it requires constraints; it needs limitations) but then offers us this compelling visual: The conscience acts as an embankment of sorts, channeling our freedoms in healthy moderation.

Father Williams makes the case, now and again, that fun too often has a negative connotation. He risks losing his audience when he equates "just having fun" with rock 'n' roll silliness (Cyndi Lauper, Billy Joel) and risks making virtue seem as wan a thing as the devil would like you to think it.

Though he risks preaching to the choir, Father Williams doesn't try to make a case that because of the state of today's world we need a moral guidebook. He speaks in terms of humanity's ageless quest for good and battle with selfishness.

In his "Living the Love Story," Christopher P. Klofft takes the view that to live and love morally in modern society one must see how modern society has created the "perfect storm" of ills.

He writes as though the problems of 21st-century morality (i.e., the lack thereof) have created rather than fueled our present-day miseries.

Never mind that morality in the Old Testament had its mountainous pitfalls (Sodom and Gomorrah, unmarried lovers Samson and Delilah, murder and adultery starring David and Bathsheba).

Never mind that the Catholic Church itself is riddled with glaring immoralities (without even venturing into the 20th century and beyond).

Serious issues of homosexuality, contraception and abortion have been around for thousands of years. Because they were underground in the "old days," they just didn't have to be discussed in polite company.

Now that they are, here is his guide to morality.

In dealing with morality as a modern problem, Klofft misses the larger issue of mankind's struggle with right and wrong as far back as Jacob's arrangement with Leah, Ruth and a handmaid or two.

Perhaps they could have used a guidebook.

In the chapter "Men Are From Muck and Women Are From Ribs," he writes, "Even within marriage, it seems that men and women can hardly get along today. Why is this?"

For anyone who thinks that's a recent development, I guess they should read Klofft's book. For the rest of us, Father Williams' book has far more to offer.

God's love for us is rich in Scripture

BY SHARON K. PERKINS
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

My mom and dad, like many other parents, tried during my childhood to teach me the wisdom of doing certain things: eating my vegetables, putting money aside in savings, getting enough sleep, caring for my belongings, etc.

The repetition of their instructions usually had limited effect, for even as I paid lip service to them most of the time, I obeyed because they held a position of authority, not because I recognized the truth in their admonitions.

As I became more mature and less stubborn, I received those same nuggets of parental advice more enthusiastically — but mostly from the mouths of other people with whom I didn't share the parent-child relationship.

This Sunday's passage from Deuteronomy follows several chapters' worth of seemingly endless statutes and commandments covering a variety of situations: a collection of Yahweh's "parental advice" to his people.

While each of these directives conveys a truth helpful for living faithfully in community, it's easy to see how this same people, generations removed from a relational encounter with the living God at Mount Horeb, might have "hardened their hearts" as well as their ears, rendering them unmoved by God's message.

When Jesus taught in the synagogue, he repeated many of the words that his ancestors had heard, but something about the way he communicated them — "a new teaching with authority" — not only drove out unclean spirits but jarred his hearers from their complacency and opened them anew to the healing, yet challenging presence of the living God in their midst.

In Jesus, God not only raised up the promised prophet "from among your own kin" and brought a fresh voice to the ancient truths, he himself became living Word among us.

For many Christians today, the Scriptures are widely accessible through the printed page and repeated liturgical proclamation — a privilege so familiar and taken for granted that we become impervious to their transforming power.

By inviting Jesus, the living Word of God, into our hearing and reading of Scripture, we not only open ourselves to receive God's words anew in all their richness, but we move beyond lip service to the loving relationship that God longs to have with each of us.

Catholic actor Montalban dies at 88; was voice for faith in career

LOS ANGELES (CNS) — Catholic actor Ricardo Montalban, whose work in television and movies also included several Catholic projects, died Jan. 14 at age 88 at his home in Los Angeles.

He had been suffering from congestive heart failure.

A family representative told the news media his funeral would be private.

The Mexican-born Montalban — best known for his role as Mr. Roarke on TV's "Fantasy Island," which ran for six seasons, and for his commercials for the Chrysler Cordoba with its "soft Corinthian leather" and "crushed velour" — always credited his faith for helping him in Hollywood.

Montalban won several awards for his contributions to the entertainment industry and the Catholic faith.

He also won an Emmy for the 1978 TV movie "How the West Was Won."

His film career encompassed dozens of films dating to 1948's "On an Island With You" and 1949's "Neptune's Daughter," in which he was paired with Esther Williams.

Montalban also was featured in "Across the Wide Missouri" (1951), "Cheyenne Autumn" (1964), "The Singing Nun" (1966), "Sweet Charity" (1969) and "Star Trek 2: The Wrath of Khan" (1982), as well as movies in the "Planet of the Apes," "Cannonball Run" and "Naked Gun" series.

Offstage, Montalban founded an organization called Nosotros in 1970 to help improve the image of Spanish-speaking people and to increase employment for Hispanics on both sides of the camera.

Montalban was made a Knight Commander of St. Gregory the Great in 1998 by Pope John Paul II.

He won the lifetime achievement award in 2003 from Catholics in Media Associates, saying it was "my tenacity and faith that has seen me through my many years in entertainment."

The year before, Montalban was given the first Spirit of Angelus Award by Family Theater Productions "for a body of work of surpassing quality complemented by a faith lived with integrity and generosity."

At the ceremony, Montalban said his Catholic faith had been and was the most important thing in his life, followed closely by his marriage to his wife of 50 years, his family and his two countries

He also encouraged young filmmakers at the awards ceremony to find freedom through discipline and doing what is right.

Willy Raymond, Family Theater's national director.

"He has supported our work ... for more than 60 years through our radio programs and our Angelus Student Film Festival," he said in a Jan. 14 statement.

Montalban got involved with Family Theater shortly after he met its founder, Holy Cross Father Patrick Peyton. One of the actor's first projects was a radio program, "Blue Memorandum," in which he starred with Lionel Barrymore.

Montalban won the Personal Achievement Award in 2000 from the Gabriel Awards' sponsors, Unda-USA, now known as Signis.

The award is presented each year to an individual whose career has provided outstanding leadership to the broadcast and entertainment community in furthering the Gabriel Awards' ideals of uplifting and supporting the human spirit and dignity.

In 1998, Montalban was among those who received papal honors at a Mass sponsored by the Archdiocese of Los Angeles. He used a walker during the Mass and visibly suffered from an old spinal-cord operation.

But despite his pain he beamed at reporters after the Mass, saying, "I'm in seventh heaven."

A group of Catholic media industry leaders feted Montalban in 1988 with its Crux Mea Stella (The Cross Is My Star) award.

Even before he achieved popularity in Hollywood, Montalban was a working actor in New York. The book "The Story of St. Malachy's — The Actors' Chapel: A Church on Broadway" included Montalban among the many high-profile Catholics who attended the parish's 4 a.m. Sunday Mass after all of Manhattan's nightspots had closed.

And, before staking his claim to U.S. fame, Montalban had appeared in 50 movies in Mexico.

Some of the Catholic-oriented productions in which Montalban participated included "Voz Latina: Radio for the Latin Explosion," produced by Family Theater in the mid-2000s; the 1988 Catholic Communication Campaign program "Beyond the Dream: Immigrants in America," which originally aired on NBC; and the 2001 CCC-funded documentary "The Face: Jesus in Art," which is a perennial on PBS stations nationwide.

He also hosted the docudrama "Fatima," which presented a history of events in Portugal at the time of the Marian apparitions at Fatima.

Montalban was married to Georgiana Young, sister of actress Loretta Young, from 1944 until her death in 2007. He is survived by their four children and six grandchildren.

'The strongest card we have'

Faith rituals help students in crisis, priest tells campus ministers

BY ANDREW NELSON
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

ATLANTA — As the second anniversary of the largest mass killing on a U.S. campus approaches, the Catholic priest serving at Virginia Tech University said the church can help fearful and confused students through its mindfulness of community rituals.

The church view of the "intimacy of God with the world" is a strong perspective during times of crisis, Father John Grace said. "It is probably the strongest card we have."

More than 30 members of the National Association of Diocesan Directors of Campus Ministry, meeting in Atlanta Jan. 5-6, discussed how to support a faith community when students at a university are reeling from a crisis.

Father Grace, a priest of the Diocese of Richmond, Va., and graduate student Jeff Yacup talked about the Virginia Tech shootings that took the lives of 32 students and faculty members on April 16, 2007; the shooter, a student, then took his own life.

The priest wore his burgundy Virginia Tech polo shirt and Yacup had a "We are all Hokies" wristband, an expression of solidarity that linked Virginia Tech and all those hurting for them worldwide.

When the shootings occurred, Father Grace, not yet assigned to the campus, had just ended a 16-year stint as a Catholic chaplain at another university in Virginia. Watching the reports on the day of the shooting, he wanted to serve where he was needed.

That July, he began to work with the Catholic university community at Virginia Tech. He described the early days as an emotional roller coaster for students, from troubled memories one minute to run-of-the-mill college problems the next.

In his first days there, Catholic students took him on a "spiritual walk" around the campus, showing him the shrines to the victims and Norris Hall, where most of the killings took place, while telling him their stories.

"It broke your heart, that shrine of death and violence," he said.

Father Grace said many are surprised the university had its largest class of first-year students the fall after the shootings.

Parents focused on safety concerns, he said. But young people focused on the student unity displayed at the televised memorial services.

"They saw a huge community in a group hug," he said.

For Yacup, the murders are a part of his life and his faith experience, but not all of it.

"It does sting every now and then. It is part of me as long as I don't let it govern who I am," he said.

The meeting for diocesan directors was followed by the 40th anniversary convention of the Catholic Campus Ministry Association Jan. 6-9. Its theme was "Jesus in a New Generation" as workshops covered topics from "Christ Came to Heal," focused on mentally ill students, to "What's Faith Got to Do With It," which was about the environment.

At the convention, speakers urged the nearly 300 participants to be where their students are, in order to engage them with the challenges of Jesus.

Holy Cross Father Peter Walsh said a Web presence is almost mandatory, whether by having a Web page or being on the popular social networking site Facebook.

"It is kind of like having the church in the public square. Their (students) faith is represented on the large public square," said Father Walsh. "Students are online. You should be there."

Walsh and his colleague, Kathleen Byrnes, a campus minister, work at the St. Thomas More Catholic Chapel and Center at Yale University in New Haven, Conn. They are linked to several hundred students through their Facebook profile.

However, Byrnes said the technology is a tool that should at times be shut off. If a student e-mails a serious question, the minister engages the student but invites him or her to have a face-to-face conversation, she said.

The campus minister also can challenge students to have a "technology fast." Byrnes said students on retreats are told to leave behind cell phones. Being unhooked from technology is unusual for them and it allows them to focus, she said.

Father Martin Moran, a priest of the Diocese of Harrisburg, Pa., who is executive director of the Cincinnati-based Catholic Campus Ministry Association, said campus ministers serve nearly 5 million students.

Although some of today's students "don't buy into the institutional church," they are interested in the spiritual aspects of religion, said Father Moran, who for nine years was the chaplain at Bucknell University in Lewisburg, Pa.

"We have to constantly invite people back to the faith," he said.

'Life begins at conception'

Verbal precision needed in the stem-cell research debate

A short sentence in the Nov. 24 Associated Press report on the issues in the upcoming policy debate on whether or not the ban on federal funding for embryonic stem-cell research should be lifted accurately portrays the opposition argument as saying "that life begins at conception — that once fertilization occurred in the lab, so did a human being."

I subscribe to that argument, and I admire the verbal precision.

The reference, of course, is to in vitro fertilization. Whether in the womb or in the lab, when fertilization occurs, there is life. This is undeniable. A being exists that did not exist before.

Because it is human life — on its way to becoming fully human — it is, the argument goes, a human being. To assert that it is not human because it is not yet fully human is to deny the reality that a continuum of existence has begun.

This is not to say that the embryo is a human person; it may well be, but that is not the claim. The claim is simply that a being exists that is on its way to becoming fully human.

To terminate, for purposes of research, what would otherwise be an inevitable biological development to full human personhood is, the opponents say, morally wrong.

That conclusion can be drawn from human reason without the guidance of divine revelation or the rulings of organized religion. Reason sees an incipient human person and concludes that this is a life worthy of respect and protection.

Those who disagree and see no human life in this living being at the moment of conception are not to be dismissed as having no respect at all for human life and dignity.

They are, however, to be confronted on the issues of when human life begins, why any human life should not be regarded as a human being (if something exists, how can it not be?) and why a developing human being has no claim on the possession of actual or potential personhood.

To rush into a verbally imprecise policy debate about embryonic vs. adult stem-cell research would be to walk mindlessly past the possibility of widespread violation of human life, rights and dignity.

This might be compared to firing a rifle shot through a closed door when there is a possibility that a person is standing there on the other side.

Whether Americans, as a nation, are ready or even willing to engage in verbally precise, reasoned argument on these questions is highly doubtful. And that speaks volumes about our honesty and humanity as a people.

The challenges to moral and political leadership in America will be enormous in the months ahead. Ethics and power will meet in the policy arena.

If America's credibility, not to mention integrity, is to be preserved, ethics and power have to listen to one another, respect one another and become locked in respectful moral argument.

New forums may have to be found to facilitate this exchange. There may be a role here for universities. The public square is always available.

But however the issues are raised and wherever they are joined — in print, the electronic media, the pulpit, the podium or legislative forum — the human hearts and human minds that shape those arguments and debate them share one thing in common:

They all possess a human life that began at the moment of conception.

Money doubt: The economy and faith

In hindsight we can see God's hand in difficult situations

I have been avoiding the topic of the economy for months because I didn't want to add to the panic so many of us feel. What if harping on our economic woes contributed to the crisis, causing us to stop buying ice cream cones for our kids, which would force the local ice cream shop to lay off a few of the high school kids who scoop and wash the floors, and so on?

But it's time to discuss the massive elephant in our living room. The anxiety of how all of this is going to turn out has me in a full nelson most of the day.

I talked recently on Gus Lloyd's "Seize the Day" radio show (Sirius/XM satellite) about the pressure of having to generate more income from my writing projects now that my architect husband has little work.

Gus and I chatted about how difficult it is to know when to pursue new work, to be an aggressive businesswoman and brainstorm about future projects. When is it time to hang up the phone and put away the computer and fold our hands?

Two hours after the radio show I headed to my son's prayer service. I told the deacon I needed to light candles for all my friends who have lost jobs or had their salaries cut in half.

He relayed more stories of in-debt real estate agents who have young kids, of graduating seniors who are home watching Oprah, of senior citizens whose retirement funds have evaporated and are now job hunting (with the Oprah watchers) at ages 65 and 70.

I wondered how many of these people are like me: a tad challenged when it comes time to say the Serenity Prayer. What is in my life that I must accept as something I cannot change? The recession and economic disaster in this country? The industries that my husband and I have chosen?

My dad always said I should have gone into sales, darn it.

Our Turn

What can I change? The intensity with which I pound the pavement? The extra hours I work to try to compensate for the loss? Moreover, lately I keep asking myself: What is God's will, and what is my will?

Is it my will to live in a nice three-bedroom home and send my kids to a fantastic Catholic school? Is it my will to want to go to Florida next month? Is it my will to drink Starbucks coffee?

Because, as Gus mentioned on his show, so often we look back and can clearly see God's hand in a tragedy or during a very difficult time even though at the time it was happening we were clueless and despondent.

I told the radio host about my friend Michelle, who was fired two years before her husband died. This allowed her time — the best two years of her life, she vows — to be with him as he traveled the world as an army chaplain.

But I want to understand the economic crisis or problem of the day in present tense: why it's happening, how it ends and the secret gold in there.

At the end of our radio segment, Gus asked me to give him my 15-second prayer for the day.

"I guess it would be this," I said: "God, please help me to keep you in charge today and not to ask so many 'whys.'"

"I like that," he replied. "I think I'll say the same."

Religion's Influence on American Life

Two-thirds of Americans think religion is losing its influence on American life. Over the years, opinions on this topic have been volatile, with changes corresponding to major political or historical events.

Results for 2008 are based on telephone interviews with 1,009 U.S. adults conducted Dec. 4-7. The margin of error is plus or minus 3 percentage points.

Building a stronger America through catechesis

Both a saint and a statesman had catechesis as foundation to their lives

Never did I think I would be so delighted by Walter Isaacson's book "Benjamin Franklin: An American Life." What especially excited me was learning of Franklin's religiosity.

As a youth, he worked diligently on virtues he considered important in his life. Among them were justice, humility, chastity, silence, tranquility and order.

He would choose a particular virtue, commit to it for a period of time, and then evaluate his progress.

This practice reminded me of my seminary days when Jesuit spiritual directors would give us regular evening meditations on virtues (called points) we needed to improve.

Although Franklin was brought up in a Puritan atmosphere that emphasized redemption by faith alone, he believed it came from good works too, which reflects Catholic thinking.

As I reflected on Franklin and other American founders like John Adams, it occurred to me that their thinking and leadership were guided by deep religious convictions.

Their religiosity further suggested that someone was responsible for its foundation — that they had been catechized.

The word "catechize" means to resound or to impress upon by word of mouth. It implies a process whereby one person teaches another his or her religious faith.

Earlier in January the church celebrated the feast of St. John Neumann. He was born in Bohemia (modern-day Czech Republic), immigrated to America, became a priest and then the bishop of Philadelphia.

He is best known for championing catechesis. Just as the parents of our early American founders catechized them, enabling them to strengthen our nation through their faith, so too Neumann catechized young Americans and laid the strong foundations of Catholicism.

Usually a country's strength is measured in terms of its armies, economy and resources. This is true to some extent,

The Human Side

FATHER EUGENE HEMRICK

but a country's greatest strength is in its high morals.

Where there is catechesis, there is morality and efforts to live a truthful life.

No one denies that many of the present economic woes of the world are due to corruption, greed and other vices. In admitting this, we are also acknowledging that many of our woes are the result of a lack of catechesis.

However, we aren't focusing on practicing particular virtues as did our forefathers, nor are we catechizing as effectively as did St. John Neumann.

No doubt, 2009 will be remembered as the year of bailouts and restructuring. It should also be a year in which we renew efforts to restructure our catechesis.

Catechesis has been and is the heart of our nation's and church's strength.

Pope says Christians must work, pray, convert for Christian unity

The Pope Speaks

POPE BENEDICT XVI

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Full Christian unity will be a gift from God, but it is something Christians themselves must work for, pray for and experience personal conversion in order to receive, Pope Benedict XVI said.

Dedicating his weekly general audience Jan. 21 to the Week of Prayer for Christian Unity, the pope said God wants Christians to be one, but that can happen only through deeper unity with Christ. The theme of the 2009 week of prayer was "That they may become one in your hand," a quote from the Book of Ezekiel in which God tells the prophet to take two sticks, representing his divided people, and join them together.

"The hand of the prophet that puts the two sticks together becomes like the very hand of God who will gather and unite his people and, finally, all of humanity," the pope said.

Here is the text of the pope's audience remarks in English.

Dear Brothers and Sisters,

Last Sunday we began the annual Week of Prayer for Christian Unity, dedicated this year to the theme, "That they may become one in your hand" (Ezek 37:17).

This Scripture passage recalls God's command to Ezekiel to take two sticks, one representing Judah and the other Israel, and join them together as a symbol of the Lord's power to gather his people into one.

As Christians, we read these words as an exhortation to pray and work for the full unity of Christ's disciples. As the Second Vatican Council reminds us, "there can be no ecumenism worthy of the name without a change of heart" (Unitatis Redintegratio, 7).

This week offers us an opportunity to thank God for all he has done and continues to do to bring Christians closer to one another.

I am personally grateful for the many opportunities I have had to meet with representatives of churches and ecclesial communities, both in the Vatican and during my travels abroad.

Let us pray that the various initiatives this week at the local and universal levels will encourage all who confess "one Lord, one faith, and one baptism" to listen more attentively to the word of God, to deepen prayer and to intensify dialogue, so as to imitate St. Paul's example of a life completely devoted to the Lord and the unity of his body, the church.

From parochial to international

Thinking beyond U.S. borders to sister parishes

Parish work is not just "parochial" anymore. It is international.

Over the years our parish has developed connections around the world. We have sponsored nursing students in South Africa and Romania. We dug wells in Ghana.

Each year we feed hundreds of children in Malawi through Project Peanut Butter. We sponsor the Catholic education of 10 Palestinian children in the West Bank.

Our most enduring international connections, however, are with sister parishes in Nicaragua and Mexico.

In the past, U.S. parishes often maintained connections to the home country of their parishioners. Italian or German parishes might be connected to Italy or Germany. These connections were a way of affirming their ethnic identity.

Today, however, the growing phenomenon of American parishes having international sister parish relationships is not a way of affirming our identity; it is a way of stretching it.

Sister parishes make us think beyond our borders and make us aware of people and problems we might only see on the news. They also make us really Catholic by connecting us to our brothers and sisters by bonds of faith and love.

Our parish did not set out to have two sister parishes. It just happened by the guidance of the Holy Spirit.

Our-sister parish in Mexico came to us through some seasonal workers from Mexico who worked for a while at a local crab-picking plant here in Maryland. Many came from the same area in the mountains of central Mexico.

We asked how we could help their church back home. At first we just sent a check. Then we made a visit. One visit became five. Checks became projects. We paid to build a chapel here and a new roof there. Project led to project.

My sister Maureen told us about a home-building project in a small town in Nicaragua. We decided to build one house. Then we built five more.

Now we have a regular home-building program with the goal of erecting 18 houses this year.

In neither place did we have a plan. We just let the Spirit lead us. Our relationships grew organically.

Gradually we realized we needed a committee at either end. When more people are involved it is more stable. It can't be just the priests.

Each of our sister parish relationships presents challenges. For example, suspicion can be a problem. What does the other parish really want?

In Mexico, the first pastor we dealt with died in an auto accident. His successor thought that all "gringos" were Protestant evangelicals and did not want anything to do with us. We gradually overcame his suspicions.

Parish Diary

FATHER PETER DALY
CNS COLUMNIST

Language is another problem. My Spanish is rudimentary. We always need a native Spanish speaker at our end to be sure we are getting the correct information.

Expectations are also a big problem. We come from very different cultures. Our sister parishioners may presume we are wealthier than we really are. We may have priorities they don't share.

It is work, overcoming our mutual ignorance of each other to establish common goals. The relationship has to be personal and spiritual as well as financial if it is going to make a difference.

We need to pray for each other.

The key is communication. This requires frequent phone calls and visits both ways by priests and people.

The longer we have sister parish relationships, the more I think they are essential to our redemption. In the Middle Ages the church thought that the rich needed the poor to get into heaven.

After all, Jesus had said it was harder for the rich to pass through the eye of a needle.

'No food, no shelter, no medicine'

With cease-fires, Palestinians begin another type of struggle

BY JUDITH SUDILOVSKY
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

JERUSALEM — Implementation of the two unilateral cease-fires declared by Israel and the Palestinian militant organization Hamas does not signify an end of troubles for Palestinians in the Gaza Strip but just the start of another sort of struggle, said the Gaza Catholic parish priest.

"It is not enough to see that the war has stopped," Msgr. Manuel Musallam told Catholic News Service Jan. 18.

"We will begin to see psychological disturbances, diseases of question of hygiene, and other disturbances. We will need to find doctors for them, and we haven't specialists in Gaza," he said.

The Ministry of Health in Gaza estimates that 40 percent of the more than 1,300 Palestinians killed in the three-week Israeli offensive were women and children.

Israel puts the percentage closer to one-third and says most of them were caused by Hamas militants using the local population as shields as they lobbed missiles into civilian populations into Israel.

Dr. Jibril Baroud, director of a Catholic-run medical clinic in Gaza, said many people needed the advanced medical treatment available only in Israeli hospitals, and Gaza hospitals were waiting to be able to transfer them.

"The hospitals in Israel are very developed and offer complete intervention," he said. "Here we have no medicines, no materials or equipment."

Baroud, who works for the Jerusalem office of the Catholic aid agency Caritas, said he, too, was concerned about the possibility of the outbreak of epidemics such as cholera or typhus due to conditions in Gaza. Thousands of people shared public bathrooms, bodies remained unburied and were decomposing under the debris of destroyed buildings, and there were no facilities for washing up.

Many people were suffering from anemia, gastrointestinal diseases and malnutrition, as well as skin diseases such as scabies because of lack of hygiene, he said.

"There are a lot of people who have lost their homes. There is no food, no shelter, no medicine," Baroud said.

But Msgr. Musallam said he was more worried about emotional and psychological scars than physical wounds and disabilities.

"We have plenty of children who are traumatized, many are injured ... and have lost limbs," he said. "They have become handicapped. We will need to rehabilitate all these children."

"How many schools will we need for all these children and men and women? How many houses?" he asked.

With fewer than two dozen trained occupational therapists, Gaza will be in dire need of foreign therapists and mental health specialists to treat traumatized and severely injured children and adults, said Msgr. Musallam.

In addition, he said, with no state health-insurance most Palestinians will not be able to afford any kind of medical treatment and so will stay at home with their injuries.

The priest said only when the students return to school will he be able to assess the emotional and physical trauma they are experiencing and what course of action must be taken. "They will not readjust (to a normal life) just by teaching them religion," he said.

Dr. Hassan Zeyada, a psychologist and manager of the Gaza Community Center, said Gazans were not yet able to comprehend their losses. He said it would take about a week to become really aware of what had befallen them.

Palestinians estimate the economic damage to the Gaza Strip from the three-week war at $1.9 billion, including some $200 million worth of damage to 4,100 private homes. The Palestinian Statistical Authority said about 14 percent of all structures in Gaza were damaged and 31 miles of roads in the Gaza Strip were destroyed. It also said about $1 million worth of private nonstructural property, including automobiles and furniture, had been destroyed.

"People are still in shock at all the damage," said Omar Shaban, a project manager in Gaza for the U.S. bishops' Catholic Relief Services. "They are now realizing how big the damage is."

Many people were without electricity and access to television, so they were not aware of the situation in the region.

"There will need to be assistance on the construction level and (for) renovating," said Shaban, noting that as soon as the security situation allowed it CRS staff would begin to assess the damages.

He added that the heavy destruction of roads and infrastructure would make it difficult to reach some areas.

Before the end of January the Gaza Community Center, which has partnered with CRS for other programs, planned to begin primary intervention programs that include art therapy, role playing and conversations to allow children to express their emotions and share their stories.

Zeyada said that as a result of the war most children in Gaza will experience immediate consequences such as nervousness, hyperactivity, clinging to their parents, aggressiveness, acting out and loss of appetite.

He added that mental health specialists also would need to work with parents to help them understand their children's changed behavior and what they can do to help.

Israeli mental health specialists note that children in the Israeli border towns who have lived under the threat of Hamas rocket attacks for eight years also show signs of trauma, with preteens still wetting their beds and children clinging to their mothers during the day and needing to sleep with their parents at night.

They also say many children show a lack of concentration in school.

Calling generosity a "fundamental part of U.S. culture, Carl Anderson, supreme knight of the Knights of Columbus, said Jan. 23 that volunteering can help America recover from its current economic crisis.

Supreme knight: Volunteering can help nation get through crisis

FAIRFIELD, Conn. (CNS) — Volunteering can help America recover from its current economic crisis, said Carl Anderson, supreme knight of the Knights of Columbus.

"Generosity is a fundamental part of the culture of the United States," Anderson said during a Jan. 23 speech at Jesuit-run Fairfield University, but he noted the philanthropic giving index was down 22 percent in the last six months of 2008.

"Volunteerism will be especially important in this economic environment," Anderson said.

"Many charitable organizations are used to providing massive amounts of aid to a great number of people, and mobilizing volunteers, in one geographic area. But this crisis is different," he continued.

"Those in need are not in one place; they are in many. ... They are our neighbors, our friends, our family members, and they need our help," he said.

Anderson used the speech as a kickoff to a planned Feb. 27 summit in New York City on volunteerism and making a charitable response to the current economic crisis. The summit will be co-sponsored by the Knights.

The Knights, he noted, donated 1,200 winter coats for distribution at three Catholic churches in Washington Jan. 19, the federal observance of the Rev. Martin Luther King Jr. birthday holiday and the day before President Barack Obama's inauguration.

Obama had asked Americans to contribute their time to volunteer efforts on the holiday for a national day of service.

"Such calls to help our neighbor are very important. But we cannot let our efforts to foster volunteerism consist of only one Monday in January," Anderson said. "That day needs to be replicated throughout our country, over weeks and months, so that soon we will have made 2009 the year of the volunteer."

The ethic of volunteerism, according to Anderson, "is what helps Americans pull together to help our neighbors when times are tough or when disaster strikes."

"We have recently seen an outpouring of giving by our fellow citizens, at home and abroad: to the victims of Hurricane Katrina in the United States, and to those whose lives were shattered by a tsunami in Indonesia, just to name two recent examples," he said.

"The remarkable strength of the Knights of Columbus — and similar organizations nationwide — lies not only in our ability to give money, but also in our ability to match our members' time and talent with people in need through an effective grass-roots structure of thousands of active councils motivated by the Christian principle of charity," Anderson said.

The Knights of Columbus, a Catholic fraternal organization headquartered in New Haven, Conn., estimated that in 2008 members of its councils contributed $145 million and gave 69 million hours of volunteer service.

Anderson voiced his optimism that the United States would successfully emerge from the current crisis.

"This is the most innovative country in history. This is a nation filled with imagination and with people prepared to step forward," he said. "We must find ways to motivate those people, to stimulate their imagination, and to unlock the talent, energy and drive that will make a difference in America and move us ahead as a society as we enter a troubled third millennium."

Senate urged to include unborn, immigrants in children's health plan

WASHINGTON (CNS) — Expansion of the State Children's Health Insurance Program should cover pregnant mothers and their unborn children, as well as legal immigrants who have not yet been in the country for five years, the head of the U.S. bishops' domestic policy committee told senators.

Bishop William F. Murphy, chairman of the bishops' Committee on Domestic Justice and Human Development, also said in a letter to senators that SCHIP plans at the state and federal levels must not "promote or fund abortion or ignore parental rights to secure needed health care for their children in ways that do not violate their moral or religious convictions."

The bishop wrote to members of the Senate Jan. 14, the day the House of Representatives passed SCHIP legislation that includes legal immigrant children and pregnant women who are legal immigrants. The letter was made public just before the Senate began consideration of the legislation Jan. 26.

"We have encouraged Congress to strengthen, expand and improve" SCHIP, Bishop Murphy wrote. "We believe Congress has a unique opportunity and the responsibility to improve the program and garner strong bipartisan support by enacting significant legislation that affirms the life and dignity of all."

The SCHIP reauthorization bill that passed the House by a 289-139 vote Jan. 14 would expand the joint federal-state program by about $31.5 billion over the next four and a half years.

Bishop Murphy also called for a change that would codify the inclusion of unborn children and their mothers as beneficiaries of the program.

The immigration section of the legislation would waive the current five-year waiting period before legal immigrant pregnant women and legal immigrant children could be covered under SCHIP.

FROM THE VATICAN

Vatican official: Fathers should look to Jesus' relationship with God

MANILA, Philippines (CNS) — The president of the Pontifical Council Cor Unum expressed concern that weakened masculinity around the world is preventing people from grasping Jesus' teaching about his Father.

"Today, the self-understanding of manhood and especially fatherhood is in crisis," said Cardinal Paul Cordes during a Jan. 23 presentation at the Pontifical University of Santo Tomas in Manila.

The cardinal, who heads the council responsible for coordinating charitable efforts, cited reports and surveys documenting "weakened male identity."

One of the reports said that 24 million children in the United States live in a home without a father. Cardinal Cordes said that figure was 10 million in the 1960s. The report found that, compared to boys who live with their fathers, boys from fatherless homes are twice as likely to end up in prison, more likely to drop out or be expelled from school, and account for 63 percent of youth suicides and 90 percent of youths who run away from home.

In Europe, the cardinal said, recent trends also "work to diminish masculinity." Cardinal Cordes offered Jesus Christ's relationship with God the Father as a model for father-son relationships. Jesus spoke with God as a child, in a simple way, intimate and familiar, he said.

"Abba," which the cardinal translated as "papa" or "dear daddy" in today's understanding of language, reveals the most affectionate center of Jesus' relationship with God. However, he also noted the role of the father as the person who orients and directs the child and contributes to the child's growth in goodness even when it causes the child unpleasantness. Men who are not necessarily biological fathers perform that spiritual fathering role in developing children in ethics and values, he said.

Vatican asks better health care for children with Hansen's disease

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Children, especially those suffering from Hansen's disease, have a right to adequate health care, said Mexican Cardinal Javier Lozano Barragan in a statement for World Leprosy Day.

"Children run the risk of seeing their futures mortgaged by the negative consequences of their illness," said Cardinal Lozano, president of the Pontifical Council for Health Care Ministry.

The cardinal's statement was released Jan. 22 at the Vatican; World Leprosy Day is marked Jan. 25.

In his statement the cardinal focused on the needs of children with Hansen's disease and cited statistics from the World Health Organization, which in 2007 said there were more than 250,000 new cases of Hansen's, with 12 percent involving children.

He urged public and governmental institutions to respect "the right of the child to the enjoyment of the highest attainable standard of health and to facilities for the treatment of the illness and rehabilitation of health."

Health care is among the rights recognized by the Convention on the Rights of the Child, which celebrates its 20th anniversary this year.

Started 56 years ago, World Leprosy Day promotes awareness and corrects misconceptions about Hansen's disease — the formal name for leprosy — and provides an opportunity to extend thanks to those who have served its sufferers, Cardinal Lozano said.

Calling on Catholics around the world to maintain the fight against Hansen's and the prejudices against those with the disease, the cardinal praised Blessed Damien de Veuster, a Belgian-born missionary priest who served Hansen's disease patients on Molokai in Hawaii more than a century ago.

Cardinal Lozano also acknowledged the late Raoul Follereau, a Frenchman who established World Leprosy Day in an effort to combat the stigma against the disease.

"To those who suffer from Hansen's disease, to men and women religious missionaries active in the field, and the social and health care workers who help them," said Cardinal Lozano, "I express the nearness of this Pontifical Council for Health Care Ministry."

Pope appoints Rockville Centre priest to be bishop of Charleston

WASHINGTON (CNS) — Pope Benedict XVI named Msgr. Robert E. Guglielmone, 63, rector of the Cathedral of St. Agnes in the Diocese of Rockville Centre, N.Y., as bishop of Charleston, S.C.

The appointment was announced in Washington Jan. 24 by Archbishop Pietro Sambi, apostolic nuncio to the United States.

Bishop-designate Guglielmone succeeds Bishop Robert J. Baker, who headed the Charleston Diocese from September 1999 until he was named bishop of Birmingham, Ala., in August 2007. He will be ordained and installed as the 13th bishop of Charleston March 25.

"I am both humbled and grateful that His Holiness, Pope Benedict XVI, would entrust this awesome ministry to me," Bishop-designate Guglielmone said in a statement, but he admitted he was "a bit anxious about leaving Long Island where I have spent almost my whole life."

"However, I do trust in the Lord and am very encouraged by the wonderful sense of Southern hospitality I have already experienced," he said.

Diocese uses new videoconferencing technology

BY KEVIN E. MURRAY
EDITOR

CHARLOTTE — The Diocese of Charlotte is harnessing new technology to better reach and serve parishioners.

The diocese, in a project undertaken by the diocesan Catholic schools office, has acquired videoconferencing equipment to connect various locations in the 46-county diocese.

Videoconferencing uses interactive technology to allow two or more locations to interact via two-way video and audio transmissions simultaneously. Through a combination of cameras, telephones and televisions, people at different sites can communicate in a virtual face-to-face setting.

The technology also is capable of incorporating data from computers, cameras and DVDs.

"This equipment is a way to bring school staffs, principals and teachers in particular together without having to drive long distances," said Janice Ritter, assistant superintendent of diocesan Catholic schools and a videoconferencing project coordinator.

"We also have volunteers who sit on boards and drive a considerable way to attend meetings, often in the evening, which puts them on the road late at night," said Ritter. "Videoconferencing is an option that is respectful of people's time and is environmentally friendly."

In the configuration adopted by the diocese, the Pastoral Center in Charlotte serves as the main videoconferencing hub and houses the equipment to connect to the five satellite sites across the diocese — Asheville Catholic School, Bishop McGuinness High School in Kernersville, Catholic Conference Center in Hickory, Charlotte Catholic High School in Charlotte and Living Waters Reflection Center in Maggie Valley.

Each of the five sites contains a smaller version of the videoconferencing equipment, which allows it to connect to other sites independently or to multiple sites through the Pastoral Center.

The equipment already has been used for several school-related meetings, but other ministries are taking advantage of it as well.

Diocesan Hispanic ministry recently utilized the equipment for a "Why Catholic?" training session at the Pastoral Center Jan. 17.

Members of the diocesan schools steering committee use videoconferencing equipment at the Pastoral Center in Charlotte to communicate with members at Bishop McGuinness High School in Kernersville Jan. 14.

The facilitator, Sister Veronica Mendez, a Sister of Our Lady of Christian Doctrine and member of RENEW International, was able to teach the program to participants in the room as well as others in Maggie Valley and Kernersville.

"It was the first time we could hold the training session in one day, covering the diocese without having to hold multiple sessions," said Jorge Gomiz, Hispanic ministry coordinator for the Charlotte Vicariate.

"Why Catholic?" is a program of RENEW International, a Roman Catholic organization that fosters spiritual renewal and evangelization through parish-based small Christian communities.

"The videoconferencing technology allows us to reach more people efficiently and cost effectively," said Gomiz.

"I see this technology as replacing some, not all, of the face-to-face meetings we currently hold," said Ritter.

"I also see educational applications," she added. "I would love to see teachers and students investigate the use of this technology for collaborative instruction."

"With equipment housed at our two high schools, that might be a possibility in the not-too-distant future," she said.

Autistic Boy Scout leads fence-building project for autism group home

HUNTERSVILLE — Jay Conrad recently completed an Eagle Scout service project for a cause that has personal meaning.

As part of his project, Jay, a Life Scout with Troop 97, which is sponsored by St. Mark Church in Huntersville, built a fence for a Charlotte group home for adults with autism.

Jay has a form of autism called Asperger's Syndrome, an autism spectrum disorder characterized by difficulties in social communication and social skills.

Through his involvement in Boy Scouts, Jay has become more comfortable in social settings, learned and practiced organizational and occupational skills, and engaged in interpersonal relationships.

Similar to other Scouts striving to earn their Eagle rank, the highest in Boy Scouts, Jay organized a service project that would require months of planning and encompass more than 100 hours of work by a group of Scouts and adult volunteers.

After soliciting donations and materials needed, seven Scouts and three adults spent Jan. 24 digging holes for fence posts, placing posts and rails, and attaching wire mesh to the fence.

The fence will help prevent residents of the group home from leaving the property unescorted.

"The boys should be proud of themselves," said Anne McQuiston, a director with Autism Services of Mecklenburg County, administrator of the facility.

"The fence is beautiful and will serve its purpose well," she said.

Representatives of the administration hope other local Scouts will consider building similar fences for other group homes in the area.

"It's as if we were delivered back on the wings of angels." Catholic survivors of plane crash attribute outcome to God's mercy

New York when the plane struck a flock of birds, causing both engines to fail.

All 155 people aboard the flight survived the emergency landing.

Berretta said he believes it is "a testimony to God's mercy."

"I believe it was miraculous that all the things came together that allowed us to survive," said Berretta, himself a pilot.

Just hours after the crash, he was asked in an interview with a national television network if he was a religious man.

His answer was honest, "I try to be."

"Quite a long time ago I had a conversion type of experience back to the Catholic faith," Berretta said in an interview with The Catholic News & Herald.

He had been away from the Catholic faith since childhood, but began attending Mass again on a weekly basis during his mid-20s.

"When I look back on that part of my life, I can say that I was trying, trying but struggling to live the Catholic faith more fully," he said.

More recently, however, Berretta experienced a deeper draw to devotional prayer.

In the weeks leading up to the plane crash, he began praying the rosary on a daily basis.

And the day before the crash he had prayed the Chaplet of Divine Mercy.

"That was a prayer that I hadn't said in a long time," said Berretta, as he recalled reading about a message that Jesus gave to St. Faustina Kowalska, the Polish nun who said she had a vision of Jesus in which he asked for devotions to divine mercy.

"I remember reading in that little booklet that Jesus said to Sister Faustina that the 3 p.m. hour is the hour of mercy, and whatever you ask of the Father in virtue of my passion during this hour will be granted," said Berretta.

"It sort of hit me as we were going into the water that it was in the 3 o'clock hour. So I asked God to be merciful to us and I said a few Hail Marys and I reconciled myself to the fact that I might not live through it," he said.

In the aftermath of the crash, Berretta said he has been "giving a lot of thought to the power of those prayers."

"When you go through an experience like this — if you have faith — you feel a profound sense of gratitude.

"I try to be very thoughtful of how fortunate I am and we all are," Berretta said.

"I feel that almost obligates me to do something ... to share that," he added.

Fellow survivor Victor Warnement came away from the experience with a similar sentiment.

"You don't go through an experience like this without thinking, 'How do I give more?'" he said.

Warnement, a parishioner at St. Gabriel Church in Charlotte, believes he and the other passengers aboard Flight 1549 were part of a miracle.

"If you look at statistics, this doesn't happen," he said. "It's as if we were delivered back on the wings of angels."

Ending a 'dark chapter'

Groups applaud Obama's decision to end torture, close Guantanamo

BY DENNIS SADOWSKI
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

WASHINGTON — Presidential executive orders to ban torture and close the U.S. military prison at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, are just the first steps in an effort to assure that torture never again becomes part of American policy, said religious and human rights workers.

Organizations such as the National Religious Campaign Against Torture, which has partnered with the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops, planned to work toward getting the restrictions outlined in the Jan. 22 orders signed by President Barack Obama adopted into law.

"Our goal is to make sure this dark chapter never repeats itself in American history," said the Rev. Richard Killmer, the campaign's executive director.

Bishop Howard J. Hubbard of Albany, N.Y., chairman of the bishops' Committee on International Justice and Peace, welcomed the order to ban torture Jan. 22, saying in a statement that the president's action will "help restore the moral and legal standing of the United States in the world."

"A ban on torture says much about us, who we are, what we believe about human life and dignity and how we act as a nation," Bishop Hubbard said.

Obama's action signals a departure from his predecessor, President George W. Bush, who denied ever approving torture, but allowed "enhanced interrogation techniques" to obtain information from detainees at the prison in Guantanamo and in detention facilities around the world.

At one point, the CIA admitted to waterboarding three detainees in 2003. Waterboarding causes the sensation of drowning and is considered torture by human rights activists and some military and intelligence officials.

In all, Obama signed three orders Jan. 22. The first closes the Guantanamo prison within a year. Detainees have been held at the prison for seven years. About 250 detainees remain at the prison.

The second bans torture and the harshest interrogation methods in place since the first suspected terrorists were captured by American forces in Afghanistan in 2001.

All U.S. interrogators will be required to adhere to the Geneva Conventions and follow the U.S. Army Field Manual, which prohibits threats, coercion, physical abuse and waterboarding during questioning.

The third establishes an interagency task force to review detention policies and procedures as well as individual cases of detainees, with a report due 30 days after the signing of the executive order.

Reaction from religious and human rights groups seeking to overturn U.S. policy on Guantanamo and the use of torture was laudatory.

Matt Daloisio, a Catholic Worker and a leader in a faith-based campaign called Witness Against Torture, applauded Obama's action.

At the same time he called for a quick review of the cases of the Guantanamo detainees as well as the thousands who are being held at what are known as "black site" facilities worldwide.

London-based Amnesty International called Obama's action "a major step forward" and a "welcome sign that the new administration is willing to right the wrongs of the past."

"By prioritizing the closure of Guantanamo in his first 48 hours in office, President Obama is sending an important message to the rest of the world that the USA is now closing a dark chapter in its history," said Irene Khan, the organization's secretary general.

Pro-life leaders criticize Obama for policy reversal provisions of the Mexico City policy are unnecessarily broad and unwarranted under current law, and for the past eight years they have undermined efforts to promote safe and effective voluntary family planning in developing countries," Obama said.

He made the comments in a prepared statement Jan. 23, issued shortly after he signed an executive order reversing the ban first instituted by President Ronald Reagan in 1984.

"For these reasons," he continued, "it is right for us to rescind this policy and restore critical efforts to protect and empower women and promote global economic development."

Obama signed the order with no fanfare and with no news media in the room, a marked contrast to signings of executive orders earlier that week.

Cardinal Justin Rigali of Philadelphia, chairman of the U.S. bishops' Committee on Pro-Life Activities, called the reversal "very disappointing."

"An administration that wants to reduce abortions should not divert U.S. funds to groups that promote abortions," Cardinal Rigali said.

"Women facing unplanned pregnancies need support of family and friends — that is true in the United States or any other country in the world," said Maggi Nadol, Respect Life program director in the Diocese of Charlotte.

"To provide funding to end a pregnancy does not address the fundamental issues a mother may be facing. Very often the term 'choice' regarding abortion really translates as 'coercion,'" said Nadol.

"What a terrible way to begin a new administration, with an abortion business bailout that will exploit women in developing countries for political ends," said Charmaine Yost, president of the Washington-based Americans United for Life Action. "We should not export the tragedy of abortion to other nations, and we certainly shouldn't do so via the hard-earned dollars of American taxpayers."

The policy banned U.S. taxpayer money, usually in the form of funds from the U.S. Agency for International Development, from going to international family planning groups that either offer abortions or provide information, counseling or referrals about abortion.

A federal law known as the Hyde amendment prohibits U.S. funding from being used directly to provide abortions.

The Mexico City policy was reversed by President Bill Clinton in 1993 and re-established under President George W. Bush in 2001.

Clinton and Bush both took their actions on Jan. 22, the anniversary of the U.S. Supreme Court's landmark 1973 decisions of Roe v. Wade and Doe v. Bolton that recognized abortion as a constitutional right and overturned state laws against abortion.

The policy has been called the "global gag rule" by its opponents, because it prohibits taxpayer funding for groups that even talk about abortion if there is an unplanned pregnancy, and is known as the Mexico City policy because it was unveiled at a U.N. conference there in 1984.

Cardinal Francis E. George of Chicago, president of the conference, had urged Obama shortly before his inauguration not to reverse the Mexico City policy.

News of the executive order also drew strong public criticism from Priests for Life, a group that calls itself the largest U.S. Catholic pro-life organization dedicated to ending abortion and euthanasia, and the Catholic bishops of Colorado, as well as House Minority Leader John Boehner, R-Ohio.

"This executive order is a profound disappointment for me and millions of other Americans who were hopeful that President Obama's vow to govern from the center would apply to the divisive issue of abortion," said Boehner, who is Catholic.

Many people expected Obama, like Clinton and Bush, to sign the executive order Jan. 22, when thousands of pro-life marchers were protesting U.S. abortion policy, but he decided to wait a day.

"I see that as a sign of respect to the Catholics and other pro-life activists," said Thomas Melady, a former U.S. ambassador to the Vatican, who wanted to see the Mexico City policy remain intact.

"It says something about his style and the courtesy he extended to those of us participating in the March for Life," Melady said Jan. 23. "It says he is concerned about the other point of view, which is a good foundation for finding common ground."

Not everyone saw Obama's waiting a day after the pro-life observance as a sign of respect.

"If he respected the pro-life cause, he wouldn't have signed this order at all," said Deirdre McQuade, assistant director for policy and communications for the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops' Office of Pro-Life Activities.

"We're concerned this can only be the tip of the iceberg for President Obama's abortion policy. This should strengthen our resolve" for the pro-life cause, she said.

The executive order will not fund abortions directly, McQuade said, but it will indirectly provide financial resources to perform the procedures.

"Since these organizations will be getting U.S. funding, it will free them up to use money they would have had to spend elsewhere on abortions," she said.

According to Third Way, a Washington-based nonprofit think tank, more than 99 percent of the estimated 536,000 women who die each year from pregnancy-related causes live in developing countries. Third Way argues that, if family planning needs were met for all women in the developing world who do not have access to contraception, pregnancy-related deaths would drop by 25 percent to 35 percent.

Pro-lifers call those statistics a smoke screen to promote an abortion agenda.

signs that read "Mr. President, please save the children," and "Obama, stop the baby war: Abortion," during the 2009 March for Life Jan. 22.

Bishop Peter J. Jugis, clergy and others from the Diocese of Charlotte participated in the march, which was held on the 36th anniversary of the U.S. Supreme Court's 1973 Roe v. Wade decision legalizing abortion.

"The culmination of the march is the opportunity to pray at the U.S. Supreme Court building," said Bishop Jugis. "A group of priests, lay people and I prayed a rosary together in front of the Supreme Court, the place where this national tragedy began 36 years ago."

The same day the Supreme Court ruled on the Roe case, it also handed down the companion decision Doe v. Bolton. Together, Roe and Doe recognized abortion as a constitutional right and overturned state laws banning the procedure.

"Abortion is a complete injustice — to society, to the child who is being murdered and to the woman who is having the abortion," said Frank Delamere, religion teacher at Charlotte Catholic High School who has organized student trips to the march for 12 years.

"People need to know that this is something that is absolutely wrong and it needs to be stopped," he said.

The 150 Charlotte Catholic students attending this year's march were among the hundreds of youths from the diocese to participate.

"I was happy to see many young people from parishes all over our diocese who have come to Washington for the event," said Bishop Jugis.

Prior to the march, Bishop Jugis concelebrated a Mass with Raleigh Bishop Michael F. Burbidge in the Basilica of the National Shrine of the Immaculate Conception in Washington.

People — mostly from North Carolina — filled the shrine to capacity to attend the Mass.

"It is encouraging to see the shrine filled with so many from the dioceses of both Charlotte and Raleigh," said Maggi Nadol, Respect Life program director in the Diocese of Charlotte.

"We were fortunate that Bishop Jugis and Bishop Burbidge celebrated Mass for us the morning of the March for Life," said Nadol. "We know we face obstacles requiring God's grace to change hearts that have accepted the deceit of the pro-abortion movement."

During his homily, Bishop Jugis said it was "inspiring to see that North Carolina has turned out in full force again this year."

"The most dangerous place to be in our country is in the womb, but that can change through our prayers and sacrifices to convert hearts to the truth about life," he said.

Bishop Jugis called the pro-life movement "a beacon of hope to our society, offering the hopeful alternatives of life and love — instead of destruction — for the unborn child."

"There is always a better choice than abortion, and that is life," he said.

During the Mass, Bishop Burbidge said that when society rejects the value of life, which is at the heart of the Gospel, then "we have to stand up even stronger and that's what we're seeing here today."

"We've heard many messages from those who have been elected that they are not supporters of a culture of life," said Bishop Burbidge. "Now, more than ever, is a critical time to be witnesses of that message of life. There is reason to be concerned."

In a Jan. 22 statement, Obama said he is "committed to protecting a woman's right to choose," but he also wants to find a way to reduce the number of abortions performed in the United States each year.

But pro-life activists quickly denounced Obama's Jan. 23 signing of an executive order reversing the Mexico City policy, a move that clears the way for the federal government to provide aid to programs that promote or perform abortion overseas.

Cardinal Justin Rigali of Philadelphia, chairman of the U.S. bishops' Committee on Pro-Life Activities, commented: "An administration that wants to reduce abortions should not divert U.S. funds to groups that promote abortions."

Calling for change

Obama's vocal support of abortion came under fire from members of Congress, clergy and pro-life activists during the opening rally of the march.

For nearly two hours Jan. 22, a crowd estimated at 100,000 listened to three dozen speakers pledge to fight efforts to expand the availability of abortion and to oppose any increases in federal funding for agencies that perform abortions.

The crowd's disdain for Obama's views on abortion offered a sharp contrast to the exuberance that nearly 2 million people showered on the 44th president at his inauguration on the very same grounds 48 hours earlier.

Nellie Gray, president of the March for Life Fund which annually sponsors the march, invited Obama to discuss "important changes" in his stance. To become a president of all people, as he has pledged, Gray urged him to take steps to end legal abortion.

"Mr. President, you are a great orator, and we appreciate the great words ... but you must also be a great doer of the deeds to overturn the illicit Roe v. Wade and fulfill your responsibility to make right and proper changes as president of the United States and president of all the people," she said.

More than two dozen Republican members of Congress also were on hand, speaking about their plans to introduce legislation to limit funding to agencies performing abortions, overturn Roe v. Wade or to fund programs that support pregnant women, giving them a better chance of carrying their children to term.

Papal encouragement

Although he was not physically present, Pope Benedict XVI's greeting added to the excitement of the more than 20,000 young people at a youth rally and Mass for life Jan. 22 at the Verizon Center sports arena in Washington.

The rally and Mass, sponsored by the Archdiocese of Washington, preceded the annual March for Life.

States, Archbishop Pietro Sambi, read the message from the pope to the Verizon crowd. The pontiff said he was "deeply grateful to all who take part in this outstanding annual witness to the Gospel of life, and to the many others who support them by fasting and prayer."

His Jan. 22 message noted that "no Christian can shirk the moral duty of affirming the sacredness of God's gift of life at every stage of its development and working to ensure that this fundamental human right receives due legal protection."

Latest 'Chicken Soup for the Soul' series is written for Catholics

BY CAROL ZIMMERMANN
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

WASHINGTON — The "Chicken Soup for the Soul" series can now add Catholics to the more than 200 groups in its targeted audience.

In mid-December, "Chicken Soup for the Soul: Living Catholic Faith" became the most recent addition to a series that has sold more than 112 million copies in 40 languages over the past 16 years.

The "Chicken Soup for the Soul" books are filled with personal stories (always 101) and each volume is aimed toward a specific audience. There are books specifically directed to members of the Jewish faith, Latter-day Saints, Christians and Christian women.

LeAnn Thieman, who co-authored "Living Catholic Faith," is no stranger to the "Chicken Soup for the Soul" phenomenon. She has co-authored nine other books in the series and is currently working on a new "Chicken Soup" book about miracles.

When Thieman, who is Catholic, was first approached about working on a "Chicken Soup" book for Catholics, she wasn't sure such a book was necessary since the series already had a book addressing Christians.

She changed her mind in 2005 during the media coverage of Pope John Paul II's death and funeral Mass, which she said revealed the large number of devout Catholics in the world.

Around that same time, she received another call from the "Chicken Soup" publisher who said Catholics should have their own book. This time she agreed, saying, "You're not doing it without me."

The book's stories include anecdotes about the sacraments, praying the rosary, growing up Catholic, good role models and challenges in living the faith.

In a Jan. 8 phone interview, Thieman said she tells fellow Catholics that they'll find "a bit of your family, your roots and yourself in this book."

She said the stories are ones Catholics will identify with and "should really rekindle their faith."

What impressed her the most in the two-year process of gathering stories and editing them was "how people love this church and their Catholic faith. Even people who have problems (with the Catholic Church) in the end are drawn to it and love it," she said.

Thieman said the new book should "give us pride in our faith," something she acknowledged Catholics could use some help with today.

The appeal of the "Chicken Soup for the Soul" books, she said, is that people relate to the stories.

Or as Thieman put it: "When people read stories they relate to, they feel understood."

They find hope, she said, from reading that "someone's been where they are" and just learning how they handled or coped with a situation.

It also turns out that people have plenty of stories to tell. Thieman said she has received at least 4,000 submitted stories for "Chicken Soup" books she's edited. From that number, only 101 can make the final cut.

And for Thieman, it's not all about dosing out inspiration. She said she receives her fair share of inspiration from those she meets at talks around the country.

"I'm humbled that God picked me to do this," she said.

American Catholic Historical Association honors two books

NEWYORK (CNS)—The American Catholic Historical Association selected "Vatican Secret Diplomacy: Joseph P. Hurley and Pope Pius XII" by Charles Gallagher as the best book on the history of the Catholic Church in the 12 months that ended June 30.

The book won the association's John Gilmary Shea Prize and a $750 award.

Gallagher, who is a Jesuit scholastic, has taught at the College of the Holy Cross in Worcester, Mass., and worked as archivist-historian of the Diocese of St. Augustine, Fla.

"Passion and Order: Restraint of Grief in the Medieval Italian Communes" by Carol Leroy Lansing was chosen for the Howard R. Marraro Prize, awarded each year to the author of a distinguished scholarly work dealing with Italian history or Italo-American history or relations.

Lansing is a professor of history at the University of California at Santa Barbara. In 2008 she was a visiting professor at the Harvard University Center for Renaissance Studies in Florence, Italy.

The awards were presented Jan. 4 during the association's annual meeting in New York.

Faith in God will help us persevere

BY JEFF HENSLEY
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

The quality of drivenness is obvious in the attitudes of Paul and Jesus in this weekend's reading.

Paul's great desire was to preach the good news to others so they could enter into the love of God made possible by Jesus' presence among us. Jesus was moved to carry out the Father's will by going about announcing the love of God and showing his Father's greatness, power and compassion through healing and teaching.

They showed the highest of motivations: the desire to help others in the name of God, and a self-forgetfulness in pursuing those goals.

Job, by contrast, pulls himself along, suffering the passing of time purposeless, depressed and defeated. He has no great drive; he has all but given up under the great weight of his trials.

We can identify with both ways of facing the world. We learn in other passages that, to Job's credit, he clings to the shard of his broken faith in the face of his supposed friends who search for ways to find him at fault for his run of incredibly hard times.

Even his wife asks why he doesn't simply curse God and die.

But faith, no matter how small, is substantial and without knowing why God is allowing all of this to happen, Job perseveres in the belief that God remains God, no matter what.

At this moment, my wife, who had major cancer surgery only three weeks ago, is spending her second uncomfortable night in the hospital with her elderly, frail mother who injured her hip.

Tomorrow, unable to walk, her mother will have to go from the hospital to some other form of assisted care to help her with the simplest things of life. She remains the same delightful, happy woman I have known for 45 years despite an aphasia that robs her of her power to effectively use spoken words to communicate.

Sometimes life is hard. But my wife, like Job, continues on. Like Paul and Jesus, she has a sense of purpose, a drive to do what she can to make sure her mother is cared for with love and respect.

And with the psalmist we can still say: "Praise the Lord, for he is good. ... Praise the Lord, who heals the brokenhearted and binds up their wounds."

Questions:

Have you had to endure hard times in pursuit of your goal of serving God, others or your family? What did you learn from persevering in faith? How has it made you stronger?

Scripture to be Illustrated:

"The Lord sustains the lowly" (Psalm 147:6a).

Renee Zellweger and Siobhan Fallon Hogan star in the movie "New in Town." Hogan, who grew up in a small town in the Diocese of Syracuse N.Y., has a master's degree from the theater program at The Catholic University of America in Washington.

Catholic actress Hogan likes roles, pace of her career

BY MARK PATTISON
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

WASHINGTON — You probably would not recognize Siobhan Fallon Hogan by name, although you might have spotted her in a few landmark screen hits.

She had a recurring role three times on TV's "Seinfeld" and a role in the movie "Men in Black," spent one year as a member of the "Saturday Night Live" cast and, last year, played the part of a birthing instructor who sounds a lot like cartoon character Elmer Fudd in the film comedy "Baby Mama."

From "Baby Mama," Hogan landed a role in the new romantic comedy "New in Town," starring Renee Zellweger and Harry Connick Jr.

But Hogan, who described herself as being the "goof" of her Irish-American Catholic family when she was growing up, doesn't take a lot of roles. For one thing, she's the mother of three children in a Catholic school in New Jersey.

"I like to work on projects as they come (and) finish them. If I work only a couple of months out of the year, it works for me. My agent won't let me read that, but it's true," she said.

For another, Hogan routinely rejects roles she finds at odds with her faith.

"I get scripts and when I read them, I think, 'I can't believe they're going to make this,'" she said.

Hogan added that she rarely sees the film or TV projects she has passed up.

"I have very few regrets on those. No — I have no regrets on things I did not do," she said.

Hogan grew up in a small town in the Syracuse Diocese that had no Catholic school. But she got her bachelor's degree from Jesuit-run Le Moyne College in Syracuse, then got a master's degree from the theater program at The Catholic University of America in Washington.

Her one season on "Saturday Night Live," 1991-92, was different from what she had expected.

"I'm not a stand-up comedian, I'm an actress," she said. "It was really competitive. It was the 'Wayne's World' time," referring to a recurring sketch that starred Mike Myers and Dana Carvey.

"Women got only one sketch per show," she said. "You had to claw your way to the top. I'm not a fighter. You either get me or you don't."

Still, "SNL," as it is popularly called, proved to be "a great platform" for landing movie and TV roles, according to Hogan. It also put her in good stead for the "Baby Mama" role.

Hogan had played on "30 Rock," which stars "SNL" alum Tina Fey, who was going to be in a lead role in "Baby Mama." In addition, "SNL" creator Lorne Michaels was executive producer of the movie. In "Baby Mama," Hogan stole the scenes she was in, even a deleted scene included in the DVD version of the film that's now out.

Hogan likes her role in "New in Town." She plays an executive assistant to Zellweger's character, a corporate executive sent by her company to its plant in a small Minnesota town where she might have to cut jobs or close it.

"I play a Christian ... and there's a great scene when the town comes together to save the cheese factory," Hogan said.

Of her co-star Connick, she noted. "Oh, he's a Catholic. He sang for the pope."

Last April Connick performed two pieces he composed for an event with Pope Benedict XVI when the pontiff came to the U.S.

Operation Rice Bowl (ORB) is the official Lenten Program of Catholic Relief Services (CRS). For 34 years, ORB has called participants to pray with their families and faith communities, fast in solidarity with those who hunger, learn about our global CRS community and the challenges of poverty overseas, and give sacrificial contributions to those in need.

The theme of this year's ORB, which begins on Ash Wednesday, February 25, is "Solidarity Will Transform the World."

Parishes and schools participating in ORB will distribute ORB items (or will post notices stating where such items can be picked up) prior to Ash Wednesday. Catholic parishes and schools that have not received 2009 ORB Lenten materials yet expected to do so, or parishes that want to order 2009 ORB Lenten materials, should call 1-800-222-0025. Learn More about Operation Rice Bowl at <http://orb.crs.org/>.

At the start of the New Year, then, I extend to every disciple of Christ and to every person of good will a warm invitation to expand their hearts to meet the needs of the poor and to take whatever practical steps are possible in order to help them. The truth of the axiom cannot be refuted: "to fight poverty is to build peace." (Pope Benedict XVI, 2009 World Day of Peace Message)

Claims on embryonic stem-cell trials said to ignore other progress

BY NANCY FRAZIER O'BRIEN
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

WASHINGTON — Reports touting recent approval of human clinical trials of a treatment for spinal-cord injuries using embryonic stem cells ignore the "great strides" already being made using adult stem cells, according to leaders of the National Catholic Bioethics Center.

"News stories are playing up the potential of the use of embryonic stem cells, as they have been for nearly a decade, despite the lack of significant progress," said an unsigned commentary posted Jan. 26 on the Web site of the Philadelphia-based bioethics center.

But adult stem cells "are already in extensive clinical use," the commentary added.

Geron Corp. in Menlo Park, Calif., announced Jan. 23 that the Food and Drug Administration had approved human clinical tests in paralyzed patients with acute spinal cord injury, using a stem-cell treatment developed from destroyed human embryos.

The stem-cell line used to develop the treatment came from embryos that had already been destroyed before former President George W. Bush's 2001 announcement barring federal funding of any stem-cell research involving embryos destroyed after the date of Bush's decision.

Dr. Thomas Okarma, president and CEO of Geron, said the FDA approval "marks the beginning of what is potentially a new chapter in medical therapeutics — one that reaches beyond pills to a new level of healing: the restoration of organ and tissue function achieved by the injection of healthy replacement cells."

The clinical trials, expected to begin this summer, would involve eight to 10 patients with "documented evidence of functionally complete spinal cord injury" who would receive injections between seven and 14 days after the injury.

Up to seven U.S. medical centers were expected to participate in the trials.

After the injections, patients would be measured for any improvement in bowel or bladder function, return of sensation or leg movement.

The National Catholic Bioethics Center commentary said embryonic stem cells "are not genetic matches for the patients in whom they are injected," thus requiring the use of dangerous anti-rejection drugs.

"Few are reporting that cells with the same properties and potential as the embryonic are now available through the process of 'differentiation,'" the commentary added, referring to the creation of induced pluripotent stem cells from cells taken directly from the patient.

The so-called IPS cells could be used to regenerate heart tissue or brain cells, and even to treat spinal injuries.

Despite the problems with rejection and the progress shown with IPS cells, "scientists continue to claim that embryonic stem cells are the 'gold standard' in the field of regenerative medicine," the bioethics center commentary said.

"Stem-cell research is the only scientific discipline where the paradigm for success is a procedure that does not work, and where other avenues that have proven successful are found wanting because they fail to live up to that defective standard," it added.

Some observers said it was significant that FDA approval for Geron's trials came three days into the administration of President Barack Obama, who has said he would overturn Bush's ban on federal funding of stem-cell research involving the destruction of new embryos.

But the approval was coincidental, according to officials at the FDA and Geron.

The art of being yourself

We are all carriers of God's love and joy

When the pet dog of a 7-year-old girl died suddenly, she was naturally very upset. The next day the adults around her were talking about the relatively short life that dogs have in relation to humans. They wondered why.

After a pause the little girl spoke up, "All of God's creatures reflect God's beauty and goodness, but dogs are able to do it sooner than humans, so God invites them to heaven quicker."

What an interesting idea!

In Genesis 1:26, we learn that we are made in God's image. That means we are meant to reflect his love and joy in our lives. But do we?

The art of being what you were created to be is not that easy for humans. Living in God's life is the way we reflect his love and joy.

The Augustinian formula for giving out holy Communion expresses this well: "Receive what you are, the body of Christ."

By being yourself, you can begin to see yourself as a radiation of God's life. By immersing yourself in his being, you become a kind of incarnation in your own right. This gives you an advantage in trying to transcend the many irksome difficulties that life imposes.

For instance, your heart may be heavy, carrying memories that tend to weigh you down. Instead of letting those memories defeat you, you can give them to God.

You can throw them overboard into the vast purifying waters of the ocean. God will clean your mind of negativity and anger, and empower you to let go of needless worry.

If you don't believe me, talk to any of the recovering addicts and alcoholics who have learned to move on in their lives. Doing this becomes a little easier when you decide that you don't have to take care of all the justice issues all by yourself.

God will do that for you, and with the burden lightened you can better enjoy each day as a unique gift of love.

Spirituality for Today

You will soon become who you really are, a carrier of God's love and joy!

Of course your emotions won't cooperate all at once, but if you get the basic theology straight, you can learn to be happy in God's happiness here and now.

St. Catherine of Siena said, "All the way to heaven is heaven."

"So don't look back, and don't allow negative thoughts to defeat you. Be your true self.

St. Teresa of Avila used to repeat to herself this mantra: "Let nothing disturb you, let nothing cause you fear. Patience obtains all. God is unchanging love. God alone suffices."

It takes some people a little longer to understand this idea, but when they do, when they surrender to something greater than themselves, they do just fine.

Mary, the mother of Jesus, said, "My soul proclaims the greatness of the Lord; my spirit rejoices in God my savior."

Try to follow her example. Try to magnify God's love in this world by being who you are.

Feel yourself being blessed by God. Believe that you are a special creation because you are a part of God's holy life. Then decide to see God's beauty in everything, including yourself.

Let his eternal joy fill your soul, and learn to enjoy your precious life.

Demanding 'personhood now'

Pro-life advocates must make enough noise for truth to be heard

Many years ago, when I was a seminarian at St. Charles Borromeo Seminary in Philadelphia, Pa., I was in line at the Acme grocery store check-out discussing a book with a fellow seminarian — it was "Horton Hears a Who!" by Dr. Seuss.

The book tells the story of Horton the Elephant who, on the 15th of May in the jungle of Nool, hears a small speck of dust talking to him. As the story unfolds, we discover the speck of dust is actually a tiny planet, home to a city called Whoville, inhabited by microscopic creatures known as Whos.

The Whos ask Horton to protect them from harm, which Horton happily agrees to do, proclaiming throughout the book that "a person's a person no matter how small." In doing so he is ridiculed and persecuted by the other animals in the jungle for believing in something that they are unable to see or hear.

In the end, Horton is vindicated when each member of the Whoville society plays a part in making enough noise that the jungle can finally hear the sound, thus reinforcing the moral that "a person's a person no matter how small."

My fellow seminarian and I were debating about the pro-life message contained in the story when a woman in line ahead of us turned around and interrupted, "How could you possibly interpret that story in that way? You're just reading that into a simple children's story." The woman was clearly aggravated that this children's story could be interpreted with such an unambiguously pro-life message. She is not alone.

The Wikipedia reference for the book mentions that several pro-life groups have adopted the phrase "a person's a person no matter how small" in defense of the pro-life message. However, Audrey Geisel, Dr. Seuss's widow, "doesn't like people to hijack Dr. Seuss characters or material to front their own points of view."

Both women — the anonymous woman at the grocery store and Audrey Geisel — clearly do not want to admit the obvious connection between the fictitious story and the reality of the pro-life message in the midst of the culture of death. It takes little imagination to make the connection between these two, particularly when we consider that at the heart of the pro-life message is the truth that "a person's a person no matter how small."

Abortion advocates have already conceded their position necessitates that abortion doesn't eliminate a person (in their opinion), but a mass of impersonal cells. However, as science and medical technology have already proven, it takes more imagination to assume that, from the moment of conception, the mass of living and growing cells is not an individual person than to concede it actually is.

"Horton Hears a Who!" exposes the disturbing issue that lies beneath the surface of the abortion debate and indeed reveals the more profound problem that pervades our fallen world: the depersonalization of the human person.

It is, in fact, the same unsavory issue that motivates the proliferation of pornography, prostitution and human trafficking, homosexuality, euthanasia, embryonic stem-cell research and a host of other evils that strip the human being of personhood.

Thankfully, many persons are beginning to defend the issue that underlies the pro-life movement. At the annual March for Life in Washington, D.C., Jan. 22, I read signs that contained the message attributed to Horton the Elephant — "A person's a person no matter how small" — and other signs that demanded: "PERSONHOOD NOW."

Personhood lies at the foundation of the pro-life message. Perhaps if those of us who know this truth, and indeed live this truth, will make enough noise, those who refuse to acknowledge the reality of personhood may soon be converted.

Father Buettner is pastor of St. Dorothy Church in Lincolnton.

Inspired by faith

I just wanted to share how much my 4-year old daughter, Sara, and I enjoyed reading about Patrick Veilla ("With blind ambition: Deafblind man overcomes disabilities to serve God," Jan. 16).

Just a few days before seeing the article, I was sharing with Sara the stories of Helen Keller and Ann Sullivan. She now wants to make a book for the blind.

Patrick's faith and his mother's faith are incredibly inspiring. Thank you for the article, and I pray for Patrick's further discernment either as a priest or other vocation. No doubt he will continue to inspire with his faith.

Perspectives appreciated

Kudos to Anita Veyera's guest column, "A perspective on spiritual parenting" (Jan. 16). The faithful need to be reminded that our priests administer to so many people that the idea of being biological fathers would be impractical.

And how true it is that they "have legacies that live in the hearts of the faithful long after they are gone." So many of us have fond memories of the various priests who have touched our lives. Nice job!

Serving 'Jesus incognito'

DSA a way to proclaim Christ, serve his people

A former pastor once promoted the Diocese of Charlotte's Diocesan Support Appeal by saying we are serving "Jesus incognito" when we give to the annual appeal.

He even went so far as to use specific examples.

The person who goes to Catholic Social Services for counseling following the death of her husband is really "Jesus incognito."

The refugee escaping persecution in his homeland is really "Jesus incognito."

The poor and hungry who come to food pantries for assistance are — once again — "Jesus incognito."

This image of "Jesus incognito" remains with me long after the priest moved on to another parish. And the theme of this year's DSA, "Proclaiming Christ through Service," reminds me of that image, too.

In my job of promoting the DSA over the years, I've had many opportunities to meet the people who were "Jesus incognito." Some were young seminarians eager to serve the people of the diocese as parish priests.

Others were catechetical leaders entrusted with the mission of teaching our children in the ways of the faith.

I've met prisoners and prison chaplains, grieving families and counselors, adoptive families and social workers, eager immigrants and Hispanic ministry coordinators.

That image of "Jesus incognito" was applicable in every case.

Over the years, my job has taken me from one end of the 46-county diocese to the other. It took me to a cow pasture outside of Murphy where I met a young man, Todd, who was able to start a cattle farm thanks to a matching grant from Catholic Social Services' Office of Economic Opportunity.

It took me to Asheville, where I met two delightful and energetic children adopted through Catholic Social Services.

In Morganton, I was privileged to witness a spirit-filled gathering of prayer, song and leadership formation, thanks to the work of the Hispanic coordinator.

I have witnessed the great work being done by Catholic campus ministers at Western Carolina University, North Carolina A&T State University, High Point University, Brevard College and Wake Forest University.

Yes, my job has opened my eyes to searching for "Jesus incognito." I have seen Jesus not only in the person of those being served, but also in the person of those doing the serving.

We are all called to be "Jesus incognito" for others and, at the very same time, we are expected to see Jesus in everyone we serve. In that regard, I feel confident that our contributions to the DSA really do "Proclaim Christ through Service."

The 2009 DSA runs Feb. 1 through March 8. Won't you too help "Jesus incognito"?

Fighting poverty in the Diocese of Charlotte

CCHD invests in people's dignity, helps fund solutions

As we exit the month of January, a month which the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops designated as "Poverty in America Awareness Month," it is worthwhile to reflect on how people in the Diocese of Charlotte are addressing the problems of poverty.

A prime resource in the war on poverty as well as social injustice is the Catholic Campaign for Human Development (CCHD). Established in 1970 by the U.S. bishops, CCHD is one of the largest private funders of self-help programs initiated and led by poor people in the nation.

It works for the end of poverty and injustice in the United States by investing in the dignity of people living below the poverty line and supporting community efforts to create permanent, systemic solutions.

Last year, thanks to the generous contributions of parishioners across the Diocese of Charlotte, $65,000 in national grants and $45,000 in local grants were extended to 24 organizations. A snapshot book at several recipients of these funds provides good examples of the effective use of CCHD funds.

In Charlotte, St. Peter's Homes (operating as McCreesh Place) helps men with disabilities transition from homelessness to permanent, affordable housing by giving them access to the support services they need.

In this way, single men who have been marginalized by economic barriers — such as low or no income and lack of transportation — as well as emotional barriers are provided opportunities to once again fully participate in their community and society.

Near Winston-Salem, the national office of the Newborns in Need organization assists low-income mothers in caring for their babies by providing health care supplies for babies in crisis due to health problems or poverty; it also educates mothers in finding local resources to support them in caring for their infants.

Sam Safrit, a Newborns in Need board member, said, "The CCHD grant came at the best possible time and helped us establish new partnerships to make dramatic growth in our outreach possible during this past year. Thank you so much for helping us help the babies."

In Franklin, the Perpetual Health Medical Clinic operates as a nonprofit, self-sustaining, community-supported family medical practice that serves the uninsured and those not qualifying for government programs.

It incorporates the efforts of local volunteers and the service recipients themselves in making the clinic work.

Extending a community approach to the problems of the poor is where CCHD funds find one of their most effective outlets — by helping the poor to participate in the decisions and actions that affect their lives.

CCHD supports projects nationwide that know no racial or religious boundaries — projects that help create jobs, improve neighborhoods and allow people to find a way out of poverty, not just for a day but for a lifetime.

Across our diocese, as across the nation, the Catholic Campaign for Human Development continues to be a formidable weapon in the fight against poverty.

In the Diocese of Charlotte, the CCHD program is housed within Catholic Social Services' Office of Justice and Peace. For further information, please call (704) 370-3234 or e-mail mjbruton@charlottediocese.org.

Pastors need to be strong, loving fathers of God's many children, says pope

The Pope Speaks

POPE BENEDICT XVI

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Pope Benedict XVI prayed that Christians would treat all people lovingly as members of God's one family and that pastors would be strong yet tender fathers of the Christian community.

"Christians are no longer strangers or guests, but fellow citizens with the saints and family members of the household of God," the pope said Jan. 28 at his weekly general audience.

The Christian community is also open to everyone, as all people are capable of knowing the truth of God's love and message of salvation, he said.

With an estimated 4,000 people gathered inside the Paul VI hall, Pope Benedict continued his audience talks about the life and teaching of St. Paul, focusing on his letters to Timothy and Titus — also known as the pastoral epistles.

Even though the Christian community was still quite small at the time the pastoral epistles were written, its universality was strongly emphasized, said the pope.

Christianity is "a living faith open to everyone and gives witness to God's love for all people," he said.

Therefore, Christians are "to slander no one, to be peaceable, considerate, exercising all graciousness toward everyone," he said quoting from St. Paul's Letter to Titus.

The letters "present the church in very human terms as God's household, a family in which the bishop acts with the authority of a father," he said.

In his First Letter to Timothy, St. Paul lists detailed traits and qualities needed for the office of bishop. These included such things as being temperate, self-disciplined, hospitable, able to teach, gentle, having a good reputation among non-Christians and being fatherly, said the pope.

He prayed that the church's bishops and priests increasingly take on more fatherly feelings for their flocks and be "loving and strong fathers who build up God's house, the Christian community and the church."

The pope also asked that the Christian faithful increasingly show a loving attitude for other people in society and treat everyone as members of God's family.

At the end of his audience talk, Pope Benedict was treated to a festive juggling act by members of the Italian Medrano circus troupe.

Jesuits seek deeper understanding of immigration with border project

BY J.D. LONG-GARCIA
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

NOGALES, Mexico — When Leoba Marcos crossed the Sonoran desert earlier this year, she didn't know what to expect.

She made her way in early January with a group of about 20, including her husband, 13-year-old son and 3-year-old daughter. It was the second time Marcos had crossed the U.S.-Mexican border illegally.

This time, she crossed via Sonoita, a Mexican border town south of Lukeville, Ariz. The group, led by a smuggler, had walked about six hours before U.S. Border Patrol agents apprehended them.

"They were hiding," Marcos said, shaking her head. "We didn't say anything and we didn't run. They just took us to a detention center."

Marcos and her children were deported to Nogales, but her husband was deported to Mexicali — more than a five-hour drive away. While she waited for her husband, Marcos and her children found refuge in a shelter for deported women and children run by the Missionary Sisters of the Eucharist.

The sisters are part of the Kino Border Initiative, a binational effort headed up by the California province of the Society of Jesus. The joint effort will staff a care center for a growing number of deported migrants, serve as a contact point for numerous humanitarian organizations working on the border and educate the community on immigration issues.

"The Kino Border Initiative is an important step in responding to the deportation of those who have been asked to leave the country — to make sure that their departure is safe, that they are cared for," said Bishop Gerald F. Kicanas of Tucson, Ariz., during a Jan. 18 press conference at Sacred Heart Church in Nogales.

The initiative will work closely with the bishops of the Diocese of Tucson and Mexico's Archdiocese of Hermosillo, as well as with Jesuit Refugee Service.

Jesuit Father John McGarry, California provincial, said the effort takes on the spirit of the man for whom it is named, Father Eusebio Francisco Kino, a 17th-century Jesuit missionary who served in Sonora.

"We Jesuits are committed to the poor, the immigrant, the disenfranchised," he said. "The beginning of this new ministry and service to the church and to people in need is a concrete sign to that commitment."

The initiative will study immigration on the border and document migrants' stories from their journey to the border to their capture by the Border Patrol.

"The complex issue of immigration is first and foremost about people — God's people and their lives, their dignity and their livelihood," he said.

The initiative "is designed to accompany the migrant people, especially those deported and alone, to serve them and help them, particularly women and children," he said.

"The women who have come here to stay have been abandoned."

— Araceli Wedington, immigrant

Araceli Wedington tried entering the United States illegally when she was eight months pregnant. She was trying to make it back to her family in Kansas. Two of her children live there with her husband, a U.S. citizen.

She unexpectedly received divorce papers while she was in Mexico and hastened her return. She crossed alone.

When she came across a group, she would first hide and then follow at a distance. Wedington, who first crossed in Tijuana five years ago, knew that many border crossers are robbed and many women are raped.

At one point on the journey, Wedington fell and, fearing she was going into labor, sat near a highway and waited for the Border Patrol to find her. She was taken to the hospital, but deported before having the baby.

"I wanted to be (in Kansas), but they didn't accept my story," she said of the Border Patrol agents. "I wanted to speak to my husband, but they didn't believe me."

Wedington found her way to the sisters' women's shelter in Nogales and eventually gave birth to a healthy baby boy, Victor Emmanuel.

To get to the shelter, she climbs four stories of dusty, concrete steps. The apartment itself has a common area, a small kitchen and two bedrooms — each crammed with two sets of bunk beds.

"The women who have come to stay here have been abandoned; they're hungry and thirsty and they have blisters on their feet," Wedington said.

"When the women arrive, they don't know what to do. They don't have any money; they don't have any food and their families don't know what's become of them."

The women's shelter, Wedington said, gives women a chance to think and reflect on what they will do next. For deported migrants, just being there is a focus for the Kino Border Initiative.

"A lot of people are suffering," said Jesuit Father Sean Carroll, executive director of the initiative.

He noted an increased number of deportees finding their way to care centers where deported migrants can get hot meals and help with medical needs.

"We're serving a lot of people," he said. "We want to respond to them and relieve that suffering, and through that we hope to also be transformed."

Father Cayetano Cabrera, pastor of Cristo Rey Parish in Nogales, said U.S. economic troubles are pushing many migrants back to Mexico. But, he said, those who return don't find work in Mexico either.

PATRIARCHAL PLEDGES

Russian Orthodox Patriarch Kirill raises the cross during his enthronement service in Christ the Savior Cathedral in Moscow Feb. 1. Patriarch Kirill, the new leader of the world's 160 million Russian Orthodox, pledged to keep his church united, recruit the young and dialogue with "sister churches."

Pope sends message, chalice to new Russian Orthodox patriarch

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Pope Benedict XVI gave a chalice to the new patriarch of the Russian Orthodox Church and expressed his hope that Catholics and Russian Orthodox can improve their relationship.

"It is my earnest hope that we will continue to cooperate in finding ways to foster and strengthen communion in the body of Christ in fidelity to our savior's prayer that all may be one so that the world may believe," the pope said.

Pope Benedict's message to Patriarch Kirill of Moscow was delivered by a high-level Vatican delegation attending his enthronement liturgy in Moscow Feb. 1. The pope also sent Patriarch Kirill a chalice as a sign of his hope that the Catholic and Orthodox churches soon will be in full communion with each other, the Vatican said Feb. 2.

Patriarch Kirill, 62, was elected patriarch Jan. 27 after serving almost 20 years as chairman of the Russian Orthodox Church's department for ecumenical relations. In that position, he had met Pope Benedict three times over the past four years.

Pope Benedict said that the new patriarch, as the head of ecumenical relations, "played an outstanding role in forging a new relationship between our churches, a relationship based on friendship, mutual acceptance and sincere dialogue in facing the difficulties of our common journey."

While Catholic and Russian Orthodox leaders had frequent contacts over the past 20 years, the Russian Orthodox repeatedly said relations had not progressed far enough to make a meeting between the pope and the patriarch appropriate.

The tensions between the two churches arose mainly from the re-establishment of the Ukrainian Catholic Church and of Roman Catholic dioceses in the territories of the former Soviet Union once religious freedom was restored.

Despite the tensions, Pope Benedict said in his message, there has been a spirit of openness and cooperation with the Catholic Church "for the defense of Christian values in Europe and in the world. I am certain that Your Holiness will continue to build on this solid foundation for the good of your people and for the benefit of Christians everywhere."

The Vatican delegation to Patriarch Kirill's enthronement was led by Cardinal Walter Kasper, president of the Pontifical Council for Promoting Christian Unity.

After meeting privately with Patriarch Kirill Feb. 2, Cardinal Kasper told Vatican Radio that the new Russian Orthodox leader thanked the pope for his message and for the chalice and gave the cardinal a letter to deliver to the pope.

"He said he wanted to continue the approach begun by his predecessor in relations between our two churches," the cardinal said, particularly affirming the need for the churches to give people moral guidance and hope in the midst of the global financial crisis.

"Patriarch Kirill added that our dialogue also touches on the unity of the church, on ideological problems, because that which we hold in common regarding social issues is based on and rooted in our common faith," the cardinal said.

Malaysian official tells non-Muslims not to challenge Islam

KUALALUMPUR, Malaysia (CNS) — Amid a dispute over the use of the word "Allah" in a Malaysian Catholic newspaper, a government official has warned non-Muslim leaders not to "challenge the sacredness of Islam."

Mingguan Malaysia, the Sunday edition of the Utusan Malaysia daily, reported the remarks of Ahmad Zahid Hamidi warning non-Muslim leaders not to raise issues that anger Muslims.

Utusan Malaysia is owned by United Malays National Organization, the race-based political party that leads the coalition federal government.

For the past few years, the Herald, a Catholic weekly, has been engaged in a dispute with the government over its use of Allah for God. The Home Affairs Ministry has said that Allah refers exclusively to the god of Islam.

Zahid said such problems would not arise if all parties recognize that Islam is the official religion of the country.

The official said he suspects "a certain agenda" in the Herald controversy, since non-Muslims are forbidden from proselytizing Muslims in the country.

"Do not play with fire. Do not challenge the Muslims. We will do anything to protect our holy religion," he said.

The newspaper report also cited comments by a Catholic government official, Bernard Dompok.

According to the Sarawak Talk Web site, Dompok urged the Home Affairs Ministry Jan. 24 to stop "harassing" the Herald. Calling it an unnecessary controversy, he said the ministry should just let the courts decide on the matter since a hearing is pending. The High Court has set Feb. 27 for the hearing.

The Herald is a small newspaper with a circulation of 14,000 copies. It is sold only in Catholic churches and carries the word "terhad," which means limited, on the front page of every edition in compliance with a Home Affairs Ministry requirement.

Pope says love, not euthanasia, eases the suffering of the dying

No tear goes unnoticed by God, pope says

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Love is the only thing that can ease the suffering of the terminally ill and it is the only worthy response of those who value the life that is ending, Pope Benedict XVI said.

Christians must have the courage to say publicly and clearly that "euthanasia is a false solution to the drama of suffering, a solution unworthy of the human person," the pope said Feb. 1 during his midday Angelus address.

Marking the Italian Catholic Church's celebration of Pro-Life Sunday, the pope said helping a terminally ill person die might give the impression of easing that individual's suffering, but the only authentically human response to the suffering of another is the witness of "love that helps one face pain and agony in a human way."

"Of this we are certain: No tear — not of one who suffers, nor of one who is near to that person — goes unnoticed by God," Pope Benedict said.

The pope entrusted to Mary all those who are suffering and all those who care for them, "serving life at every stage: parents, health care workers, priests, religious, researchers, volunteers and many others."

Mary understands suffering and what it means to watch a loved one suffer, the pope said, because she shared the painful hour of her son's Passion and Crucifixion, sustained by hope in the Resurrection.

Pope says labor unions important in resolving financial crisis

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Pope Benedict XVI said labor unions have an important role to play in finding a way out of the global financial crisis and establishing a new culture of solidarity and responsibility in the marketplace.

"The great challenge and the great opportunity posed by today's worrisome economic crisis is to find a new synthesis between the common good and the market, between capital and labor. And in this regard, union organizations can make a significant contribution," the pope told directors of the Confederation of Italian Labor Unions Jan. 31.

The pope emphasized that the inalienable dignity of the worker has been a cornerstone of the church's social teaching in the modern age, and said this teaching has helped the movement toward fair wages, improvement of working conditions and protection of vulnerable categories of employees.

Workers are facing particular risks in the current economic crisis, and unions must be part of the solution, he said.

"In order to overcome the economic and social crisis we're experiencing, we know that a free and responsible effort on the part of everyone is required," the pope said.

"In other words, it is necessary to overcome the interests of particular groups and sectors, in order to face together and in a united way the problems that are affecting every area of society, especially the world of labor," he said.

"Never has this need been felt so urgently. The problems tormenting the world of labor push toward an effective and closer arrangement between the many and diverse components of society," he said.

He noted that his predecessor, Pope John Paul II, had underlined labor as the key component in social questions and had described the labor union as an indispensable element of social life in modern industrialized societies.

Pope Benedict has been working on his first social encyclical, tentatively titled "Caritas in Veritate" ("Love in Truth"), which is expected to be published sometime this year.

DIOCESAN REQUIREMENTS FOR REPORTING MINISTRY-RELATED SEXUAL ABUSE OF A MINOR

1. Any individual having actual knowledge of or reasonable cause to suspect an incident of ministry-related sexual abuse is to immediately report the incident to the Chancery.
2. The Chancery will then report the incident to the proper civil authorities. The individual reporting the incident to the Chancery will be notified of the particulars regarding the Chancery's filing of the incident with civil authorities.
3. This reporting requirement is not intended to supersede the right of an individual to make a report to civil authority, but is to ensure proper, complete and timely reporting. Should an individual choose to make a report to civil authority, a report is still to be made to the Chancery.

AROUND THE DIOCESE

Youth ministry takes proactive approach to gangs contacted by members of the youth ministry team in the Diocese of Charlotte who were concerned about some of their youths and the possibility that they were affiliated with a local gang," said Paul Kotlowski, director of diocesan youth ministry.

After researching the issue, Kotlowski realized "this is a problem that is not going to be going away."

He talked to local police officers and attended a community education night in Guilford County.

"That was incredibly eye opening," he said.

He then began searching for other Catholic dioceses and agencies that had written materials addressing the issue of gang involvement among youths. But his search did not turn up any results.

"I thought, 'somebody needs to make something,'" he said.

Kotlowski began developing a resource to educate youth leaders on the fundamentals of gangs and equip them with the tools they need to deal with the issue. The resource addresses issues such as warning signs, gang influence and gang structure. It contains anti-gang resources, a gang presence assessment tool and a prayer to end gangs.

After sending an electronic copy of the resource to youth ministers in the diocese, Kotlowski said the overall response was one of appreciation.

"They are thankful that the diocese is taking a pro-active approach to this emerging trend," he said.

"I thought it was a great idea to give us a tool to help us work with these teenagers," said Jeanine Marsilia, faith formation coordinator at St. Phillip the Apostle Church in Statesville.

Marsilia was having problems with a few of the teens in the church's faith formation program.

"We started seeing destructive behaviors in our classrooms," she said.

A few of the youths had gang names tattooed on their hands and were wearing gang colors and bandanas to their faith formation classes.

But the biggest problem was that they were trying to recruit and intimidate other teens to join their gang.

"When you see behavior problems you need to deal with them promptly before it gets out of hand," said Marsilia, who ended up asking the gang members not to return to the classes.

"They are kids that are lost," she said. "They are struggling and they look to the gangs for structure."

"Some of them still can be helped," she added, but the real challenge is finding the right balance. "It's hard because you don't want it to affect the other children."

Marsilia said the resource has been helpful because it is something she can give to the parents.

Sharon Hoilett, faith formation

"If we have one kid who is in a gang, that is one kid too many."

— Paul Kotlowski, diocesan youth ministry director director at Our Lady of Consolation Church in Charlotte, also has found the resource helpful, although she hasn't had any direct problems with gang involvement among her youths.

After receiving the resource, Hoilett requested to schedule an in-service workshop — a follow-up service offered by the diocesan Youth Ministry Office.

"We haven't had any outward signs," she said, but "it is something that we need to talk about with our kids."

Hoilett said that the church has been warned by police about gangs in the neighborhood. They stressed "we should be careful with our kids because of activity that goes on in the area," she said.

The church has responded to the warning by adjusting the weekend faith formation schedule — eliminating the wait time between Mass and classes.

As a teacher for Charlotte-Mecklenburg Schools, Hoilett said that she "realizes the problems the kids face in the school system."

That was "one of the reasons I wanted someone to come out and talk to the kids," she said. "It's just another form of awareness."

On the diocesan level, Kotlowski said his plan is to "continue to raise consciousness, keep channels of communication open and continue to take a pro-active stance to confront problems as they emerge."

"The culture of gangs stands in direct contradiction to the culture of life," he said.

"We need to do whatever we can as a church to promote a culture of life, which means providing an alternative to destruction and evil."

"If we have one kid who is in a gang, that is one too many," said Kotlowski.

Groundbreaking held for low-income senior apartments

MOORESVILLE — The Diocese of Charlotte is building affordable housing for the elderly.

Bishop Peter J. Jugis took part in a groundbreaking ceremony for Curlin Commons in Mooresville Jan. 29.

Curlin Commons is named for Bishop Emeritus William G. Curlin of Charlotte, who served as bishop from 1994 until his retirement in 2002.

Curlin Commons is "a fitting tribute to a servant of God who continues to spend his life and ministry caring for the needs of others, especially the poor," said Bishop Jugis.

The 40-unit apartment building for low-income senior citizens is a project of the diocesan Housing Corporation and the Affordable Housing Group of NC, Inc.

The Housing Corporation is an outreach to create, promote and operate housing facilities that provide necessary services to enrich and empower the lives of seniors, families and individuals with low income and special needs.

The Affordable Housing Group is a nonprofit organization that develops affordable housing and provides assistance to community-based and faith-based organizations in North Carolina.

The facility will incorporate "green" building features to make it energy efficient, reduce its environmental impact and enhance its residents' quality of life.

The facility is expected to be completed by the end of the year. Apartment units will be available to seniors, regardless of religious affiliation, who qualify for low-income housing assistance.

The diocesan Housing Corporation is partly funded by contributions to the Diocesan Support Appeal. This year's DSA campaign runs Feb. 1 through March 8.

Pope condemns Holocaust denial, reaffirms solidarity with Jews

JEWS, from page 1

Speaking the day after International Holocaust Remembrance Day, Pope Benedict said he hoped "the memory of the Holocaust will persuade humanity to reflect on the unpredictable power of evil when it conquers the heart of man."

The Jews were "innocent victims of a blind, racist and religious hatred," he said at the end of his general audience in the Paul VI hall.

The pope recalled his many visits to Auschwitz, calling it "one of the concentration camps in which millions of Jews were brutally slaughtered" by the Nazis.

"May the Holocaust be a warning to everyone against forgetting, denying or minimizing" what happened to millions of Jews "because violence waged against just one human being is violence against everyone," he said.

"May violence never again humiliate the dignity of mankind," he said.

The Holocaust should be an important lesson for old and new generations, teaching them that "only the arduous path of listening and dialogue, love and forgiveness leads the world's peoples, cultures and religions to the hoped-for goal of fraternity and peace in truth," said the pope.

British-born Bishop Richard Williamson of the traditionalist Society of St. Pius X has claimed that reports about the Holocaust were exaggerated and that no Jews died in Nazi gas chambers. He repeated his position in a Swedish television interview recorded last November but aired Jan. 21 — the same day Pope Benedict lifted the excommunication against him and three other bishops who had been ordained against papal orders in 1988 by the late French Archbishop Marcel Lefebvre. The Vatican made the decree public Jan. 24.

In a letter posted on his blog Jan. 30, Bishop Williamson apologized to Cardinal Dario Castrillon Hoyos for "having caused to yourself and to the Holy Father so much unnecessary distress and problems."

Cardinal Castrillon heads the "Ecclesia Dei" commission, which oversees the reconciliation of Lefebvrite Catholics with the church.

Critical response

Jewish groups expressed shock that after Bishop Williamson's comments were televised the Vatican would still lift the excommunication against him. The Chief Rabbinate of Israel postponed a March 2-4 meeting in Rome with the Pontifical Commission for Religious Relations with the Jews.

Rabbi David Rosen, a member of the delegation of the Chief Rabbinate, said the meeting with the Vatican had been postponed indefinitely "until a response comes from the Vatican that's satisfactory to enable us to resume our relationship as before."

The director general of the Israeli Chief Rabbinate, Oded Wiener, said the pope's Jan. 28 statement condemning the denial of the Holocaust was "extremely important ... for all humanity" and that it was a "great step forward" in resolving the current embroilment between the Vatican and the rabbinate.

He said a letter he sent Jan. 27 to the pontifical commission's chairman, Cardinal Walter Kasper, in the name of the Chief Rabbinate was not intended to sever the ties, which were created in 2000, but simply to express deep disappointment at the reinstatement of Bishop Williamson.

The letter asked for a public apology from the bishop and for a postponement of the joint commission's planned meeting in March until the matter was clarified. He told CNS he was certain that members of the rabbinate's commission would be meeting for further discussion by early February in light of the pope's statement.

Wiener emphasized that, concerning Bishop Williamson's remarks, "We don't for one second believe this is the position of the pope."

The Vatican spokesman, Jesuit Father Federico Lombardi, told reporters Jan. 28 that Vatican officials hoped the rabbinate would resume dialogue with the pontifical commission so that its concerns could be addressed with "further and deeper reflection."

Father Lombardi said the pope's remarks condemning the Holocaust Jan. 28 and on previous occasions "should be more than enough of a response to the expectation of those who have expressed doubt concerning the pope and the Catholic Church's position" on the Holocaust. The spokesman said only with continued dialogue could relations between the Jewish world and the Catholic Church "successfully and serenely continue."

To further underline the many occasions the pope has publicly condemned anti-Semitism and expressed his closeness to the Jewish people, the Vatican posted archived footage of the pope on its new YouTube channel Jan. 28. The three video clips give excerpts of the pope's talks during his visit to a synagogue in Cologne, Germany, in 2005; his visit to the Nazis' Auschwitz-Birkenau camp in Poland in 2006; and his general audience at the Vatican after his trip to Auschwitz.

'Foolish' remarks

Cardinal Kasper said the traditionalist bishop's remarks were unacceptable, "foolish" and in no way reflect the position of the Catholic Church.

"Such gibberish is unacceptable," the German cardinal said Jan. 26. "To deny the Holocaust is unacceptable and is absolutely not the position of the Catholic Church."

The Vatican released a statement Jan. 27 from the head of the Swiss-based Society of St. Pius X, Bishop Bernard Fellay, who apologized for the damage caused by Bishop Williamson's remarks and said they in no way reflect the positions of the Society of St. Pius X.

"We ask forgiveness of the pontiff and of all people of good will for the dramatic consequences of this act,"

The photograph of a prisoner is seen at the Auschwitz museum near the former death camp Auschwitz-Birkenau in Oswiecim, Poland, Jan. 27. Holocaust Memorial Day is commemorated internationally Jan. 27, the anniversary of the date of the liberation of the Nazi concentration camp Auschwitz-Birkenau in 1945.

Bishop Fellay wrote.

He said he had prohibited Bishop Williamson from speaking publicly on political or historical questions "until further orders."

"While we recognize that these remarks were inopportune, we cannot help but note with sadness that they have directly struck our society, discrediting its mission," he said.

In the United States, Abraham Foxman, national director of the Anti-Defamation League, said in a Jan. 24 statement that the pope's decision "undermines the strong relationship between Catholics and Jews" and was "a most troubling setback."

He said the ADL was "stunned the Vatican ignored (its) concerns" after it wrote a letter Jan. 23 to Cardinal Kasper saying that lifting the excommunication against a bishop who minimized the Holocaust and rejects the reforms of the Second Vatican Council would "become a source of great tension."

Foxman said the pope's gesture toward reconciling with the bishop sent "a terrible message to Catholics around the world that there is room in the church for those who would undermine the church's teachings and who would foster disdain and contempt for other religions, particularly Judaism."

The American Jewish Committee expressed its "shock and regret over the Vatican's decision" in a press release Jan. 24.

Long journey ahead

Cardinal Kasper, who co-chairs the International Catholic-Jewish Liaison Committee with Rabbi Rosen, said he could see how Bishop Williamson's opinions could "cast a shadow over (Vatican) relations with Jews, but I am convinced dialogue will continue."

The cardinal said removing the excommunication against Bishop Williamson and the bishop's comments were two completely separate issues. By lifting the excommunication, he said, the pope was removing an obstacle to the Vatican's dialogue with the society.

"We will need to see in what way they accept the (Second Vatican) Council" before further steps toward reconciliation and unity can be taken, he said.

In the past, the Society of St. Pius X has not accepted the liturgical reforms of Vatican II and its concepts of religious freedom and ecumenism.

A front-page article in the Vatican newspaper, L'Osservatore Romano, called Bishop Williamson's remarks on the Holocaust unacceptable, "very serious and regrettable."

The paper underlined the church's teachings against anti-Semitism, which are clearly outlined in the declaration "Nostra Aetate." The Jan. 27 article said these teachings were "not debatable" within the Catholic Church.

It said the reforms the church adopted after Vatican II could never be jeopardized or "thrown into crisis by a magnanimous gesture of mercy" by the pope in seeking to reconcile with the traditionalist society.

French Cardinal Jean-Pierre Ricard of Bourdeaux said that resolving the many dogmatic and ecclesial questions remaining between the church and the society will be a journey that is "undoubtedly long."

But doctrinal issues are not the only thing making reconciliation difficult, said the cardinal, a member of the "Ecclesia Dei" commission.

Cultural and political attitudes, such as those reflected in the "unacceptable" remarks by Bishop Williamson concerning the Holocaust, also can hamper full reconciliation, he said in a press release Jan. 24.

The Swiss bishops' conference said the traditionalist bishop's remarks "worsened concerns" over the "deep divergences" between the society and the Catholic Church. It condemned Bishop Williamson's comments and apologized to the Jewish community in Switzerland for the upsetting episode.

"Those who know Benedict XVI and his positive attitude toward Judaism know that the indefensible ravings of Bishop Williamson will not be tolerated," the conference said.

Fighting the FOCA fiasco

Rumors aside, legislation no threat to Catholic health care

BY NANCY FRAZIER O'BRIEN
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

WASHINGTON — Internet rumors to the contrary, no Catholic hospital in the United States is in danger of closing because of the Freedom of Choice Act.

As a matter of fact, the Freedom of Choice Act died with the 110th Congress and, a week after the inauguration of President Barack Obama, has not been reintroduced.

But that hasn't kept misleading e-mails from flying around the Internet, warning of the dire consequences if Obama signs FOCA into law and promoting a "FOCA novena" in the days leading up to Inauguration Day.

The Catholic Health Association "is strongly committed to opposing FOCA and (the board) is unanimous that we would do all we could to oppose it," said Bishop Robert N. Lynch of St. Petersburg, Fla., an elected member of the CHA board of trustees since June 2006.

"But there is no plan to shut down any hospital if it passes," he added in a Jan. 26 telephone interview. "There's no sense of ominous danger threatening health care institutions."

Sister Carol Keenan, a Daughter of Charity who is CHA president and CEO, was equally sure that FOCA poses no threat to Catholic hospitals or to the conscience rights of those who work there.

"I don't believe that FOCA will pass, although we will continue to monitor all proposed regulations for their potential to help people in this country and for any negative assault on the life issues," she said.

As introduced in previous congresses, the legislation "has never contained anything that would force Catholic hospitals or Catholic personnel to do abortions or to participate in them," she added.

But even in a worst-case scenario, if the most dire predictions were to materialize and a federal law were to mandate that all hospitals provide abortion services, "I want to make it very clear that Catholic health care will not close and we will not compromise our principles," Sister Carol told Catholic News Service Jan. 26.

If necessary, Catholic hospitals will take a lesson from "how people have dealt with unjust laws" in American history, "and we would respond in the same way," she said.

"A very timely example" of that is segregation, which was backed up by U.S. laws and Supreme Court decisions that were unjust, Sister Carol said.

"It was a very long and very painful journey to deal with that and now we have an African-American president," she added.

Some of the confusion over FOCA might arise from the fact that the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops launched a long-scheduled postcard campaign to Congress against the possible legislation just as the false Internet rumors were reaching a peak.

The postcards, which are being made available for Catholics to sign at Masses over several weekends in January and February, ask members of Congress to oppose FOCA "or any similar measure, and retain laws against federal funding and promotion of abortion."

"At this time of serious national challenges, Americans should unite to serve the good of all, born and unborn," the postcards say.

The FOCA novena e-mails, the source of which has not been identified, have a different tone entirely.

Calling the legislation "the next sick chapter in the book of abortion," the e-mails say it will force all hospitals to perform abortions, increase abortions by 100,000 annually and "could result in a future amendment that would force women by law to have abortions in certain situations (rape, Down syndrome babies, etc.) and could even regulate how many children women are allowed to have."

The rumors have spread like wildfire on blogs and Web sites. On the social networking site Facebook, three separate anti-FOCA groups with membership totaling nearly 130,000 (as of early Jan. 27) contain misinformation about what the so-far-nonexistent legislation would do.

Bishop Kevin W. Vann of Fort Worth, Texas, is "brand new as episcopal liaison" to the Catholic Health Association, a position he got in part because of his background as a medical technologist for three years in a Catholic hospital in Springfield, Ill., before he began his seminary studies.

"There is nothing definite yet about what is being introduced" in Congress, he told CNS Jan. 26.

"But CHA is really committed to monitoring any proposed legislation and to upholding the sacredness of life in all our institutions," he said.

Bishop Vann said the postcard campaign, run by the U.S. bishops' pro-life office and the National Committee for a Human Life Amendment, is getting a good reception from Catholics in his diocese.

"It's the voice of everyday folks expressing concern about FOCA in whatever form it comes," he said.

"As Catholics, we want our voices heard and this postcard campaign is one way that we can do that in a unified manner," said Maggi Nadol, director of Respect Life, a program of Catholic Social Services of the Diocese of Charlotte.

"The idea is to flood Washington with a large amount (of postcards) in a short amount of time," she said.

Poll shows disapproval of Obama's Mexico City policy reversal

WASHINGTON (CNS) — Although a majority of Americans support many of President Barack Obama's early actions in office, only about a third back his decision to allow funding for overseas family planning groups that provide abortions, according to a new poll by USA Today/Gallup.

The results of the survey conducted Jan. 30-Feb. 1 show that "this is no time to divide our nation with policies that offend the pro-life values of most Americans," said Deirdre McQuade, policy and communications assistant director with the U.S. bishops' Office of Pro-Life Activities, Feb. 3.

Asked about seven actions taken by Obama as president, the majority said they approved of his moves to:

— Name special envoys for the Middle East and for Afghanistan and Pakistan (76 percent).

— Tighten ethics rules for administration officials (76 percent).

— Limit interrogation techniques used on prisoners (74 percent).

— Institute higher fuel efficiency standards (74 percent).

— Make it easier for workers to sue for pay discrimination (66 percent).

But only 44 percent said they supported Obama's decision to order that the Guantanamo Bay prison be closed and only 35 percent were in favor of his decision to reverse the Mexico City policy, a ban on federal funding of abortion-providing groups abroad that was first instituted by President Ronald Reagan in 1984.

The margin of error for the poll by USA Today/Gallup was plus or minus 3 percentage points.

Obama gets advice from Catholic social thinkers

"The Obama administration's 9/11 has already occurred," said Jesuit Father John Langan, professor of Catholic social thought at Georgetown. "It both gives and takes away."

He was one of four panelists assessing the new administration in its early days and Catholic social teaching as it relates to domestic and global concerns in a Jan. 29 program.

Father Langan said that regardless of what transpires on Capitol Hill and at the White House, the church must continue to advocate for the poor and prod officials to remember the needs of the unemployed and those in danger of losing their homes during debates on how to best to foster an economic recovery.

"Simply preserving the institutional structure of the financial community is not enough," he said.

The panelists tackled a broad range of domestic and global issues in a two-hour discussion, outlining deepening concerns related to health care reform, the plight of immigrants, reducing the world's nuclear weapon stockpiles and engaging Iran to ensure American security and peace in the Middle East.

In the end, the panelists concurred that with Democrats in charge at the White House and at the Capitol, many of the church's concerns about health care, the economy, the unemployed, the poor and improved relations with foreign governments are more likely to be addressed.

Catholic University history professor Leslie Tentler pointed to the work in 1919 of the National Catholic War Council, a forerunner to the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops, as it proposed a wide-ranging social agenda.

At the time, the bishops urged President Woodrow Wilson and members of the 66th Congress to adopt publicly subsidized health care, a living wage for male workers so they could support their families, public housing, an insurance program similar to today's Social Security system, workplace safety rules, protection for the rights of workers to organize and an end to child labor.

The bishops must remain just as engaged in public policy today, offering their views that reflect the long-held tenets of Catholic social teaching, especially as they relate to justice for the poor and marginalized, said Tentler.

At the same time, she raised concern that the public perception about Catholic social teaching revolves around sex. Citing controversies over passionate debates on the definition of marriage and whether Communion should be withheld from Catholic politicians who do not oppose abortion, Tentler said the church must make known that its call for justice is broad.

Tentler suggested that the seamless garment approach to social concerns as promoted by the late Cardinal Joseph Bernardin "has a chance in this political moment to make a difference, to be heard and perhaps indeed to affect public policy."

Hopeful witnesses

Maryann Cusimano Love, associate professor of politics at Catholic University, cited Pope Benedict XVI's call to Catholics to "become for all people of the world a witness to hope" in his second encyclical "Spe Salvi" (on Christian hope).

She said Pope Benedict's call intersects with Obama's vision for hope.

"The Obama administration is pursuing very different principles, policies and processes in foreign policy," she said, "positions that dramatically realign U.S. foreign policy, much more in line with the positions of the Catholic Church."

John Steinbrunner, professor of public policy and director of the Center for International and Security Studies at the University of Maryland, suggested that the time was right for Obama to take steps to negotiate significant reductions in nuclear arsenals with Russian and Chinese leaders.

The concept of nuclear deterrence, to which the U.S. bishops gave only provisional moral approval in their 1983 pastoral letter on peace, no longer applies 17 years after the end of the Cold War, Steinbrunner said.

Reducing nuclear weapons stockpiles would lower the risk that such weapons would be used and also would make it less likely for such weapons to fall into the hands of terrorists, he said.

"We could lower the levels and still have the deterrence we need," he said.

Steinbrunner also urged Obama to move quickly to address global warming, a concern which poses a serious threat "to the viability of human societies," and to enter into "constructive engagement" with Iran.

By talking with Iranian leaders, he said, the new administration would be able to better assure U.S. security and allow the Middle East power to obtain the nuclear fuel it needs while limiting efforts that could lead to Iran developing nuclear weapons.

"It is going to require public activism," Steinbrunner said of all three concerns.

"The government isn't going to come up with this on its own. It's going to need active engagement to do so," he said.

"When I'm gone, who will receive the gifts God gave me?"

A will is your answer to the question. 60-70% of Americans die without a valid will. If you die without a will, the laws of the state you live in will determine how your assets are divided including assets to your family. Without a will or other charitable estate plan, charitable desires you may have for your parish, Catholic school, agency, diocese or the diocesan foundation will be ignored. Don't let your answer be silence.

Operation Rice Bowl (ORB), the official Lenten Program of Catholic Relief Services (CRS), begins on Ash Wednesday, February 25. For 34 years, ORB has called participants to pray, fast, learn and give in solidarity with those members of our world community who face poverty, disease, and hunger. The theme of this year's ORB Lenten Program is "Solidarity Will Transform the World." For more information about ORB, including information on how ORB funds are used by Catholic Relief Services around the world, please go to <http://orb.crs.org/>.

We, the Roman Catholics of the USA, are fortunate that the compassionate arm of Catholic Relief Services reaches out on our behalf to help meet the basic needs of millions of people worldwide. I offer my encouragement and my support to the Lenten Operation Rice Bowl Program, and thank all those parishes, schools and campus ministries participating in this charitable program.

Our Holy Father Pope Benedict XVI has called Lent a "privileged time of interior pilgrimage" toward our Lord Jesus Christ. As we ready ourselves for the joyous celebration of the Paschal Triduum, it is fitting that our prayers and acts of fasting and abstinence, and our participation in the sacramental life of the Church, be marked with outward expressions of charity to those who suffer from want of basic human needs.

Book details faith foundation of farmworker movement, author says

BY MARK PATTISON
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

WASHINGTON — A new book on Cesar Chavez and the United Farm Workers union shows not only how the tactics they adopted to win contracts have been used by other social movements since then, but also the faith foundations of the union itself, according to its author.

"There's a lot of impact that I think that the Catholic Church and the whole religious community had on the farmworker movement and the labor movement and the immigrant rights movement that I think is not given a whole lot of credit that they're due for," said Randy Shaw, author of "Beyond the Fields: Cesar Chavez, the UFW, and the Struggle for Justice in the 21st Century."

"No one had any idea how religious Chavez was and how religious the movement was," Shaw said in a Nov. 24 telephone interview with Catholic News Service. Shaw also took note of the role the late Robert F. Kennedy played in marshaling popular support for the UFW.

"The fact that Kennedy said it's a bishop's duty to stand with the farmworkers, I think, in terms of Kennedy's legacy, was extremely important," he said.

What impressed UFW leaders is that Kennedy gave his support without asking anything in return.

Kennedy first lent his support in 1966, well before grape boycotts swept the nation in order to bring grape growers to the bargaining table.

He also sat with Chavez at the end of his first "spiritual fast" in 1968, shortly before announcing his bid to capture the Democratic presidential nomination — a bid that ended with his assassination that June. Shaw also noted how the UFW served as a bridge-builder between Cardinal Roger M. Mahony of Los Angeles and the labor movement with the 2003 Immigrant Workers Freedom Ride.

Cardinal Mahony had been a staunch supporter of the UFW in particular, and unions in general, during his time as bishop of Stockton, Calif., and early in his tenure in Los Angeles.

But the cardinal's relationship with labor was strained when labor leaders blamed Cardinal Mahony for a failed attempt to organize workers at the archdiocese's cemeteries in the early 1990s.

The Immigrant Workers Freedom Ride thawed relations that had been cool for a decade, Shaw said, giving the credit to Eliseo Medina, who got his start as an organizer with the UFW and later became a vice president in what is now the nation's largest labor union, the Service Employees International Union.

"It was kind of the UFW tradition, recognizing the importance of the immigrant community," Shaw said. "That turned out to be a very important overture."

In a further show of solidarity with immigrants, Cardinal Mahony in 2006 said he would ask priests of his archdiocese to break the law rather than comply with provisions in a bill the House had passed that would criminalize the act of offering aid to illegal immigrants.

"When you have a cardinal saying we're not going to comply with this, it's pretty serious, I think," Shaw said.

Thanks to grass-roots boycotts on the national and international level, community organizing and political savvy, the UFW achieved a string of victories between 1966 and 1976. It lost badly when a California ballot measure it supported dealing with the agricultural relations board failed in 1976, but the UFW rebounded in 1979 with a lettuce strike that won it still more contracts.

"You could say that with everything that happened up to 1979, they could be as strong as ever," Shaw told CNS. "But then Cesar had to manipulate the (UFW) convention and not let the workers have a say. That decimated the union. Cesar undermined the organization he had built."

Even though the UFW is itself not as strong as it once was, its methods have inspired countless campaigns over the past generation.

They include those seeking pickle contracts between Vlasic and the Farm Labor Organizing Committee in Ohio and Michigan, pursuing tomato contracts between the Coalition of Immokalee Workers in Florida and some of the nation's largest fast-food restaurant chains, and community organizing projects in cities and towns across the country.

Shaw also noted how the UFW's signature chant, "Si, se puede," or "Yes, it can be done," was modified into "Yes, we can" for the campaign of Barack Obama, a onetime community organizer who is now president-elect.

Lent a time to seek God's compassion

BY SHARON K. PERKINS
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

"I'm hiding, I'm hiding, and no one knows where; for all they can see is my toes and my hair."

So goes a children's poem by Dorothy Keeley Aldis that many a young student of the 1960s memorized and probably still recalls. The rhyme is a humorous, tongue-in-cheek account by a child who thinks he's hiding from his parents; the audible description of their search makes it obvious to the reader that they know where he is all along but decide to play his game for a while.

There are other kinds of "hiding" that people do, not for fun, but out of guilt and shame. The Genesis story of Adam and Eve hiding from God in the primordial garden is an insightful observation of this tendency of human beings to cover up their wrongdoing.

The urge to conceal is strong, whether it's a child hiding the broken pieces of her mother's treasured vase or an adult politician hiding past misconduct in order to get elected. Most of the time, however, the transgressor becomes isolated in his or her guilt and what was hidden eventually comes to light anyway.

In both the first reading and the Gospel, leprosy and the means for dealing with it are used as metaphors for sin, its capacity to isolate the sinner and the importance of "coming clean."

The rituals prescribed by Moses are simply a means for the sufferer and the community to publicly acknowledge both the disease and the cure so that nothing remains hidden.

Jesus' interaction with the leper in the Gospel adds yet another welcome dimension to the problem of human sin, guilt and isolation. Moved by compassion, he touches and heals the man, indicating that in the reign of God the consequences of sin and suffering are not only brought to light but restored to health.

When that healing takes place, Jesus instructs the once-isolated leper to give public thanks to God and to return to his restored place in the community.

In a few days, Christians will enter the penitential season of Lent, an opportunity to come out of hiding: to put aside the games of self-deception, to seek God's compassion and mercy, and to celebrate our healing with one another — perhaps through the sacrament of reconciliation.

It is the perfect time for us to "come clean."

Questions:

What sinful tendencies and actions have you gotten into the habit of hiding from yourself and others?

How can the approaching season of Lent become a time of healing and restoration for you?

Scripture to be Illustrated:

"Then I acknowledged my sin to you, my guilt I covered not" (Psalm 32:5).

Pope asks young Catholics to use technology to share their faith

Virtual lives may become obsessive, pope warns; face-to-face relationships encouraged

BY CINDY WOODEN
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

VATICAN CITY — Pope Benedict XVI asked young Catholics to use their computers, Facebook accounts, blogs and Internet video posts to share with their peers the joy of faith in Christ.

"Be sure to announce the Gospel to your contemporaries with enthusiasm," the pope told young people in his message for the 2009 celebration of World Communications Day.

"Human hearts are yearning for a world where love endures, where gifts are shared, where unity is built, where freedom finds meaning in truth and where identity is found in respectful communion," said Pope Benedict's message, which was released at the Vatican Jan. 23.

The theme for the 2009 World Communications Day, which will be celebrated May 24 in most dioceses, is "New Technologies, New Relationships: Promoting a Culture of Respect, Dialogue and Friendship."

In the message — which was e-mailed directly to 100,000 young Catholics around the world and asked them to forward it or post it on their Web sites — Pope Benedict said that if used creatively and correctly new computer technologies can help people meet the human longing to connect with others and share the search for goodness, beauty and truth.

Of course, he said, people must "avoid the sharing of words and images that are degrading of human beings, that promote hatred and intolerance, that debase the goodness and intimacy of human sexuality or that exploit the weak and vulnerable."

And praising the way young people use the Internet to form and maintain friendships, he also cautioned against trivializing friendship by not forming real, face-to-face relationships.

"It would be sad if our desire to sustain and develop online friendships were to be at the cost of our availability to engage with our families, our neighbors and those we meet in the daily reality of our places of work, education and recreation," Pope Benedict said.

"If the desire for virtual connectedness becomes obsessive, it may in fact function to isolate individuals from real social interaction while also disrupting the patterns of rest, silence and reflection that are necessary for healthy human development," the pope said.

Still, Pope Benedict said, new technologies have an "extraordinary potential" to bring people together, to help them share information, to rally them to work for good causes and to educate.

"They respond to a fundamental desire of people to communicate and to relate to each other," he said.

"When we find ourselves drawn toward other people, when we want to know more about them and make ourselves known to them, we are responding to God's call — a call that is imprinted in our nature as beings created in the image and likeness of God, the God of communication and communion," Pope Benedict said.

Much of the pope's message was addressed to the "digital generation," to young people who have grown up using computers and cellular phones, e-mail and text messaging.

He asked them "to bring the witness of their faith to the digital world" and to write openly about the joys of faith when they write their profiles on social-networking sites or blogs.

The first step in evangelization is to understand the culture in which the Gospel will be proclaimed, he said, and young Catholics are the ones who have that understanding of their peers and of the Internet culture they use to communicate.

"You know their fears and their hopes, their aspirations and their disappointments," the pope told young Catholics. "The greatest gift you can give to them is to share with them the good news of a God who became man, who suffered, died and rose again to save all people."

Vatican launches video news channel on YouTube

BY CAROL GLATZ
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

VATICAN CITY — The Vatican launched a video channel on YouTube that will feature news coverage of Pope Benedict XVI and major Vatican events.

It marked the start of the Vatican's strategic vision of working "to be present wherever people are," said Archbishop Claudio Celli, head of the Pontifical Council for Social Communications.

The Vatican officially unveiled the new channel Jan. 23 during a press conference that presented Pope Benedict's message for World Communications Day, which was dedicated to new media technology.

Addressing pilgrims in St. Peter's Square Jan. 25, the pope said he hopes the YouTube channel "will enrich a wide range of people — including those who have yet to find a response to their spiritual yearning — through the knowledge and love of Jesus Christ."

The new Vatican initiative will make information and news about the Vatican more readily accessible on the Internet, the pope said at the end of his midday Angelus address. The wise use of online networking technology can help people form new communities "in ways that promote the search for truth, the good and the beautiful, transcending geographical boundaries and ethnic divisions," he said.

The Vatican channel is the result of a new partnership the Vatican Television Center and Vatican Radio forged with the Internet giant Google and its video-sharing Web site, YouTube.

The Vatican's television and radio operations had been collaborating for the past year and a half to produce short news videos that are aired on the Vatican Radio Web site.

Jesuit Father Federico Lombardi, head of the Vatican's television and radio offices, said during the Jan. 23 press conference it only seemed natural to start offering the news clips "not only to a prevalently Catholic audience, but to a much larger, practically global audience."

He said it was important to offer these services to people who are looking for the pronouncements and position of "a high-level moral authority like the pope and, in general, the Catholic Church" concerning the major burning issues and problems in the world today.

"Therefore, choosing YouTube as an appropriate platform for establishing a presence on the Web" made sense, he said, especially given that so much information on the pope and the Vatican was already appearing in fragmented, out-of-context forms and scattered over multiple venues.

By creating its own channel on YouTube — which boasts 70 million viewers a month — the Vatican is seeking to give people the opportunity to access information about the pope and the Vatican from a regular and trustworthy source, said Father Lombardi.

He said Pope Benedict "was personally informed about the project and sees it as a positive step" forward for the church.

The Vatican's ad-free YouTube channel, www.youtube.com/vatican, each day will offer one to three short video news clips of the pope or major Vatican events with audio commentary in English, Italian, Spanish and German. The footage is produced daily by the Vatican Television Center, which works with Vatican Radio to produce the audio commentary.

Viewers will be able to leave comments, distribute the videos by e-mailing or messaging the links, and share the videos with friends on various social networking sites like MySpace and Facebook, as well as submit the Vatican video links to news aggregator sites like Digg.

Unlike many videos available on YouTube, which viewers can rate according to YouTube's one- to five-star grading system, the Vatican videos cannot be rated or embedded onto external Web sites or blogs. The Vatican channel's home page, however, can be embedded elsewhere.

Just a few hours after its launch, the Vatican channel recorded more than 12,000 views and enrolled more than 500 free subscribers who will receive regular updates of new Vatican video uploads.

Henrique de Castro, a managing director for Google, said the company was honored the Vatican chose to use YouTube to communicate with people around the world.

He said in a written press release that YouTube was pleased its online users "will have access to the words of the pope on some of the most important issues facing the world today."

More people search on Google for "God," for example, than for many famous world figures and celebrities, he noted in written remarks.

Father Lombardi said the YouTube initiative was only the beginning of a long journey utilizing some of the possibilities today's digital media and platforms offer.

He said the Vatican hopes to expand the kind of video coverage it offers to include high-definition broadcasts and events without dubbed commentary, but in the original language and with "natural sound."

ARCHIVAL ANECDOTA

In honor of Black History Month, the diocesan Archive's Office presents a brief sketch of several churches that once served African-Americans in western North Carolina but are now closed.

A priest identified as Redemptorist Father Walter Bueche is pictured with first communicants at St. Mary Help of the Sick Church in Charlotte Oct. 11, 1953.

St. Anthony of Padua Church, Asheville

Located at 56 Walton St., the church was established in 1935 and staffed by the Franciscan Order. A parochial school opened in 1936, operated by the Franciscan Sisters of Alleghany.

Shortly after the church opened, devotions were celebrated three nights a week, school students were taught to sing the Propers for solemn high Masses, and 30 children were baptized in one evening. The church offered special classes to children and adults that focused on music, art and drama.

Franciscan priests continued to staff the church until 1966, when Father Joseph Howze, a diocesan priest, assumed responsibility. Father Howze became the first bishop of Biloxi, Miss., and one of the first African-American bishops.

The Franciscan Sisters of Alleghany withdrew from the school in 1969, prompting its closing. That same year, by decree of Raleigh Bishop Vincent Waters, the church ceased as a parish and its congregation was combined with that of St. Lawrence Church.

The church became a chapel of ease—it served as a supplementary chapel to accommodate those living at a distance from the parish church. The school rooms were used for religious education and a child-care facility run by the Daughters of the Church.

In 1975, the property was sold to the Tabernacle Baptist Community.

Our Lady of Perpetual Help Church, Charlotte

Located on the corner of Oaklawn Ave. and Fairfield St., the church was staffed by Redemptorist priests in 1939.

For a period of time in the 1950s, the priests drove a school bus with parish children to St. Benedict School in Belmont for Catholic education.

The Redemptorists withdrew from the parish and turned it over to the Diocese of Raleigh in 1955. At this time, Bishop Waters opened a new church for African-Americans named Our Lady of Consolation Church. Auxiliary Bishop James Navagh served as its first pastor.

The Redemptorists continued to maintain the Our Lady of Perpetual Help property at 1015 Fairfield St. It was used as a mission house and later became Our Lady of Perpetual Help Retreat House. It closed in the late 1960s.

St. Mary Help of the Sick Church, Charlotte

The church was established in 1947 at 115 N. McDowell St when Redemptorist priests purchased the property from a Baptist congregation.

The church served as a mission chapel of Our Lady of Perpetual Help Church, and initially both facilities shared the same name. However in 1952, Bishop Waters permitted the chapel to be renamed St. Mary Help of the Sick.

In 1955, it became a mission of Our Lady of Consolation Church. The structure remained intact after being sold, and an office complex encompassed it. By driving south on McDowell Street, just before East Trade Street on the right one can still view the exterior of the former church.

St. Joseph Church, Monroe

Originally under the custodial care of Our Lady of Lourdes Church, the church came into being through the efforts of Mercy Father Thomas McAvoy.

The Society of the Fathers of Mercy arrived in Monroe in 1942 to establish Our Lady of Lourdes Church. Father McAvoy performed the society's work among the African-American population and acquired property for the mission on Winchester Ave. The property consisted of a small chapel, office, classroom and a day care nursery.

Financial assistance came yearly from the Catholic Business Women's Guild in New York City. The guild helped fund construction of the church and all the religious appointments within it.

Bishop Vincent Waters dedicated the church Oct. 17, 1948, and during that year it was raised to parish status.

Throughout the years, the Fathers of Mercy appointed one priest for Our Lady of Lourdes Church and one for St. Joseph Church, but in 1960 they withdrew from Monroe; thus, diocesan priests served both churches until St. Joseph closed in the early 1970s. The property was later sold.

Our Lady of Victories Church, Salisbury

Founded in 1942 by the Holy Ghost Fathers, the church began in a store front and used the altar from the old Sacred Heart Church in Salisbury.

The mission moved to 216 S. Craig St. in 1945 and to 124 S. Lloyd St. in 1949. It became a parish in the mid-1950s. The Diocese of Raleigh took over administration in 1959.

In 1969, Bishop Waters decreed the congregation be united with Sacred Heart Church. The property was sold to the Christian Methodist Episcopal congregation in July 1972.

David Hains, communications director for the Diocese of Charlotte, gives a press conference in the diocesan Pastoral Center in Charlotte Feb. 2. Hains issued a statement from the diocese regarding Capuchin Franciscan Father Robert Yurgel, who pleaded guilty earlier that day to sexually abusing a minor in the late 1990s and was sentenced to seven years and eight months in prison.

Priest sentenced for abuse

Diocese encourages prayers for victim, victim's family

CHARLOTTE — A priest who had served in the Diocese of Charlotte has been sentenced for sexual abuse.

Capuchin Franciscan Father Robert Yurgel was sentenced Feb. 2 to at least seven years and eight months in prison after pleading guilty to second-degree sex offense. He'll also have to register as a sex offender.

In April 2008, Father Yurgel was arrested in New Jersey, where he was ministering in a hospital, on sexual abuse charges involving a minor.

Father Yurgel served at St. Matthew and Our Lady of Consolation churches in Charlotte in the late 1990s, when the incidents occurred. In October 1999, Father Yurgel's order, the Capuchin Franciscans, assigned him to ministry in New Jersey.

The victim, now in his early 20s, recently reported the matter to police. The Diocese of Charlotte was not made aware of the allegations or the investigation prior to the April 2 announcement of the arrest by police.

"The Diocese of Charlotte was deeply saddened to learn of the sexual abuse of a teenage victim by Father Robert Yurgel ... and asks for prayers for the victim, the victim's family, the perpetrator and for others who have been affected by the sinful crime of sexual abuse," said a diocesan statement issued Feb. 2 in response to the sentencing.

The victim has named the diocese, the Capuchin Franciscan order and Father Yurgel in a civil lawsuit, alleging a cover up.

"During Father Yurgel's time in Charlotte, the diocese was not made aware of any complaints concerning his conduct with minors," the diocesan statement said.

Shortly after the arrest, priests at St. Matthew and Our Lady of Consolation churches urged anyone who has been victimized by Father Yurgel or others to contact civil authorities.

In its Feb. 2 statement, the diocese also urged victims to contact civil authorities and emphasized its continued commitment to sexual-abuse awareness.

The diocese implemented a sexual abuse policy in 1989 and in 2002 adopted the U.S. bishops' "Charter for the Protection of Children and Young People." Since that time, more than 20,000 diocesan employees and church volunteers have attended the church's sexual-abuse awareness training program, "Protecting God's Children."

The diocese conducts background checks on all employees and volunteers to safeguard the young and vulnerable. More than 19,900 background checks have been conducted.

The training and background checks are ongoing.

In June 2002 at a meeting in Dallas, Texas, the U.S. bishops adopted the charter and its mandates for an annual audit and survey, and also adopted the "Essential Norms" to assure that all dioceses adhere to the charter.

The charter also established the Office of Child and Youth Protection and the National Review Board to oversee compliance with the charter. The Diocese of Charlotte has been found to be in consistent compliance.

The charter was updated in 2005, the norms in 2006. The charter and norms have Vatican approval.

NEED ASSISTANCE?

As a part of its commitment to support the U.S. bishops' "Charter for the Protection of Children and Young People," the Diocese of Charlotte has appointed a coordinator to assist survivors of sexual abuse.

The assistance coordinator can help survivors of abuse, whether the incident took place in the Diocese of Charlotte or in another diocese.

The current coordinator is David Harold. Contact him at (704) 370-3363 or dwharold@charlottediocese.org.

A Catholic approach to Internet addiction

Five-step path to recovery exists for those caught in destructive habit

I realize that one of my last columns argued that the social networking site Facebook fosters, not robs, intimacy in relationships.

I'm not alone in citing its benefits.

Jesuit Father Antonio Spadaro recently wrote in La Civiltà Cattolica, a magazine reviewed by the Vatican, that "Facebook incarnates a utopia ... that of always staying close to those people we care about in one way or another and of getting to know others who are compatible with us."

But even as Facebook and other sites have value, too much time on the Internet can emotionally drain a person and become a silent kind of addiction.

Authors Kimberly Young and Patrice Klausing explain in their excellent resource, "Breaking Free of the Web: Catholics and Internet Addiction" that "Internet addicts use the online world as a psychological escape."

"The Internet is a seemingly safe way to cope with life's problems, and it is a legal and relatively inexpensive way to soothe or avoid disturbing feelings. Because of this, the Internet can quickly become a convenient means for instantly forgetting whatever stresses and pains an addict is experiencing."

The authors present a five-step path to recovery for Catholics caught in this destructive habit.

1) Be open. At some point, the person needs to wake up to his or her behavior and realize that time once spent on supervising homework with the kids is now squandered on surfing the Net and reviewing the updates of Facebook "friends."

Like any addiction, nothing will get resolved if a person stays in denial. He or she must admit the problem before recovery takes place.

2) Seek professional help. Young and Klausing write: "It isn't easy to find a therapist familiar with the Internet, online addiction and the impact of online

Our Turn

THERESE J. BORCHARD
CNS COLUMNIST

affairs. Over time this will change, but in the meantime, make sure that your therapist is someone willing to listen and learn about the Internet in order to best help you."

3) Practice the 12 steps. They were written for people recovering from alcoholism, but they work for any addiction.

I like to summarize the first three of the 12 steps in this simple language: I can't. God can. I think I'll let him.

Young and Klausing encourage those addicted to the Internet to join a support group of folks who are battling the same behavior. According to them, "this is especially important for Internet addicts who typically suffer from interpersonal difficulties such as introversion, a limited social network and poor social skills."

4) Celebrate the sacrament of reconciliation. The authors explain how this sacrament can be a powerful and energizing force in changing behavior.

By preparing for and participating in this sacrament, a person begins the process of "establishing a right relationship with God."

5) Have faith along the journey. Young and Klausing rightly conclude that "the most challenging aspect of lasting recovery is fighting the temptation to return to the addiction," which is why it's so important to remember that God is with you — especially in those moments when fighting the beast of Internet addiction is hardest.

and that hearts be open to God's truth regarding the sanctity of life from womb to tomb.

2. Get involved. Join organizations of all political persuasions that seek to bring hope and change to this important arena. Particularly at the parish level, our priests need to be supported as they proclaim the truth about abortion, euthanasia, poverty and the dignity of human life.

3. Lobby and pray for our prominent Catholic politicians who reject church teaching. Approach all brothers and sisters in a spirit of love — an assumption of their

What the inauguration crowds were looking for

Through Jesus we find community, hope

I was in a one-room elementary schoolhouse in Nebraska when a neighboring farmer stopped in to tell our teacher President John F. Kennedy had been assassinated.

Four hours behind East Coast time, I was sound asleep when the World Trade Center towers collapsed. I couldn't understand what was going on when I awoke and turned the radio on and heard that every airport in the United States was closed.

"What could be happening?" I asked my husband.

I was in a hotel in Phoenix when Barack Obama was sworn in as president of the United States.

We'll always remember where we were and what we were doing when momentous things happen. There are many people who still recall vividly where they were, who they were with, even what they were eating when Pearl Harbor was attacked.

The power of moments like these arises from our deep desire to be part of community. We sense the immensity of what's happening, something larger than we are, and in those moments we want to be near to the heart of our collective consciousness.

This explains the most powerful aspect of President Obama's inauguration. It wasn't his speech, which fell short of his usual oratory. Instead, it was the mass of people that thronged the Mall and all of Washington.

It was the tales people had to tell, of segregation and discrimination now hopefully overcome. It was the stories of the young, who felt history moving into their generation.

Besides a need to belong, to be part of community, I felt in the crowd a powerful surge of hope. Abraham Lincoln spoke of the "better angels of our nature," and I think these better angels flooded the Mall Jan. 20.

These Americans were daring to hope.

In Lincoln's day politics and oratory were highly valued, and a far bigger percentage of the eligible U.S. population voted. Huge crowds gathered to hear a speaker discourse for two to three hours at a time.

Imagine: no microphones, no big-

For the Journey

EFFIE CALDAROLA
CNS COLUMNIST

screen TVs broadcasting the action to the back of the crowd, no sound bites or instant replays. Just huge throngs of people who came to hear a well-spoken argument.

It was the entertainment of the day, and it brought people into community.

Jesus was no stranger to crowds. Jesus climbed into a boat so he could speak to the assembly swelling on the shore.

Here's Jesus, instructing the disciples to feed the thousands who followed him.

And Jesus, watching a man being lowered through the ceiling because the crowds were so great he had no chance of gaining entrance through the front door.

What did all these people want from Jesus?

Healing, yes.

But they also wanted to find community, and they wanted hope. They wanted to believe that in this weary world, there was something, someone to believe in.

The crowd at the inauguration caused me to think about Jesus, and I wondered why more people today don't turn to him for their ultimate sense of community and hope.

After all, after 2000 years he still offers the "words of everlasting life." History hasn't dimmed his charisma, his appeal. You would think the masses would still press in upon him.

And then it struck me. Jesus doesn't speak to anyone today unless we do. That's our calling, our vocation, to offer community and hope to a weary world.

St. Teresa of Avila famously wrote, "Christ has no body now on earth but yours, no hands but yours."

In our humble way, we have to be there as Jesus to at least someone in that crowd today.

Challenge for Catholics

In a spirit of prayer and hope, I appeal to my Catholic brothers and sisters who voted for Barack Obama. Now that this historic election has taken place, before us is an opportunity and challenge for the pro-life movement.

We know good people differ strongly regarding avenues for change, but Catholic teaching is clear on the sanctity of life. I encourage faithful Catholics to consider the following:

1. Pray for the right-to-life movement

Letters to the Editor

inherent human goodness is the place where we need to begin dialoguing.

During this time of hope and promises, let's turn our energies to seeking unity and progress in protecting the basic human rights of life and liberty, especially for those whose voices cannot be heard.

— Mary Head
Asheville

Prayers for change

When Jesus' life was being taken away, he prayed, "Father, forgive them. They know not what they do."

When it comes to pro-abortion politicians and those who support them, why not also pray, "Father, forgive them. They know not what they do?"

Let us then pray that President Obama receive God's guidance so that our nation esteems life in all its fullness.

Blessing the grave

Euthanasia ideology a variation of ancient heresy

I had the privilege of blessing the grave of Terri Schindler-Schiavo, a severely brain-damaged Florida woman who was essentially murdered on March 31, 2005 by dehydration, after a court ordered that her husband could make her medical decisions for her.

Her grave is not far from the place where she died, and where people from around the world had gathered to protest and pray.

Those who visit the gravestone, however, will notice something highly unusual.

While on most graves there is an inscription of two dates — when the person was born and when he or she died — on Terri's there are three. Here's exactly what the grave says:

Born December 3, 1963
Departed this Earth February 25, 1990
At Peace March 31, 2005

The whole world knows that she died March 31, 2005. National and global media were present at the scene for days, covering every detail. Media were present again when I preached at her funeral mass.

We know when she died.
But her gravestone has become a pulpit for the euthanasia movement. Those who killed her are now using her grave as a platform for their twisted ideology.

What they are trying to say is that once her brain was injured in 1990 and she was no longer functioning like most of us, she wasn't one of us anymore. She "departed this earth."

This is actually a variation on an ancient heresy, which says that we are really spirits inhabiting a body. Terri couldn't communicate normally. So, her "spirit" must have left her. The body was just a shell left behind.

Those who believe she really "departed this earth" in 1990 can therefore pretend it was okay to kill her in 2005. After all, it wasn't really her. She was already gone.

This is heresy, because Christianity teaches that we are a unity of body and soul, not simply a soul "using" a body.

The body matters. What we do to the body, we do to the person.

Moreover, the gravestone inscription is a deep insult to all who are disabled and to all those who love and care for them.

Should they be considered already dead, too?

Are we just wasting our time caring for them?

Euthanasia advocates would have us think so.

A recent news story about a disabled unborn child quoted one as saying, "There's no human life there." Isn't that the same idea? They think the baby has already "departed this earth," so they don't hesitate to abort the body.

As I blessed Terri's grave, I also prayed that God's people would be kept safe from this falsehood.

And I recalled being in Terri's room the day she died.

I remembered her face, dehydrated from not having had a drop of water in two weeks.

I recalled seeing the flowers, inches away, on her night table. They were immersed in water.

And as I left the grave, I gave a final glance to the vase of flowers that was standing by the stone.

St. Paul continues to strengthen, renew church, pope says

The Pope Speaks

POPE BENEDICT XVI

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — St. Paul left behind "an extraordinary spiritual heritage" and his teachings will always serve to strengthen and renew the church, Pope Benedict XVI said.

This first-century apostle represents an "extremely fruitful and deep Christian thinker" from whom everyone can benefit, the pope said Feb. 4 at his weekly general audience.

With an estimated 4,500 people gathered inside the Paul VI hall, Pope Benedict concluded a series of audience talks begun in July dedicated to the life and teaching of St. Paul. The church's celebration of the year of St. Paul began June 28, 2008, and runs until June 29.

St. Paul has provided spiritual nourishment to the Fathers of the Church and the faithful for millennia, the pope said.

He said a real turning point in the reading of St. Paul's teachings came in the 16th century with Martin Luther and the Protestant Reformation he led.

Luther "found a new interpretation of the Pauline doctrine of justification," the pope said, which "gave him a new, radical trust in the goodness of God who forgives everything unconditionally."

Luther, an Augustinian monk who was excommunicated by the church for preaching against papal infallibility, emphasized the absolute primacy of God's action in freeing people from sin and making them just.

In 1999, Lutherans and Catholics signed a Joint Declaration on the Doctrine of Justification, resolving one of the issues that sparked the Reformation.

In the declaration, the churches said they agreed that, "by grace alone, in faith in Christ's saving work and not because of any merit on our part, we are accepted by God and receive the Holy Spirit, who renews our hearts while equipping us and calling us to good works."

In his general audience, the pope said biblical interpretation by Catholics and Protestants has reached "notable consensus" even on issues that had been the source of Protestant dissent.

He said this progress gives "great hope for the cause of ecumenism, which is so central to the Second Vatican Council."

Pope Benedict said drawing from St. Paul's life, example and teachings will always encourage and help guarantee the strengthening of "the Christian identity of every one of us and the rejuvenation of the whole church."

Faith amid sickness

Health crisis can bring changes, but soul and God's love are unwavering

Feb. 11, 2009, marks the 17th World Day of the Sick, established by Pope John Paul II to correspond with the feast of Our Lady of Lourdes.

The day reminds "everyone to see in his sick brother or sister the face of Christ who, by suffering, dying and rising, achieved the salvation of mankind" (letter instituting the World Day of the Sick, May 13, 1992).

This day is also an ideal occasion for the sick to be reminded of the holiness and vocational nature of suffering, whether it is physical or emotional, and that they are urged to seek ways to turn the burden of pain and illness into active witness and work for the Lord.

Often, I receive e-mails from people who fear losing their faith because of their health challenges. Fatigue, pain and the sometimes devastating course of serious illness can be isolating.

Productivity, personal identity and long-held dreams and goals can suffer too. It isn't uncommon for me to hear from fellow patients that "no one understands," that there is no use in keeping hope alive when life is so hard.

I understand this despair. I went through a very dark time when I was diagnosed with lupus.

My sense of productivity — and how I dressed — was forever changed. When outdoors, I had to completely protect myself from the sun. I lost all of my hair.

Simple tasks like opening a jar, cooking, walking became extremely difficult and sometimes impossible.

Suddenly, into my day, budget and long-term goals I had to figure a terrible illness about which there was no clear prognosis. Some friends understood and remained true, others did not.

What could have been a terrifying experience, however, became more faith-filled. In prayer there is quiet, peace and renewal.

In the holiness of Mass there is reason to celebrate and act as one with others. In Scripture there is deeper meaning in often-heard readings from both the Old and New Testaments, especially through the lives of people who also suffered.

In the example and sacrifice of Christ, there is daily sustenance for flagging energy, shaken resolve and, yes, even courage for fearful times.

Illness and faith do not cancel one another out. Those who suffer are not called to sit on the sidelines, trembling with fright.

Our lights are meant to shine brightly and not be hidden.

Living Well

In Pope John Paul II's message for the first annual World Day of the Sick, he said:

"Outside of faith, ... how can we discover in the moment of trial the constructive contribution of pain? How can we give meaning and value to the anguish, unease, and physical and psychic ills accompanying our mortal condition? ... Yes, only in Christ, the incarnate word, redeemer of mankind and victor over death, is it possible to find satisfactory answers to such fundamental questions."

When we face a personal health crisis, our circumstances might be different and our appearance and other aspects of life might change. But our essential being, our soul and our preciousness in God's eyes are unwavering.

Moreover, our call goes beyond belief to action — fearless action — that reaches out to others and extends to them the same love and comfort rooted in faith that we wish to have extended to us.

Our Lord is with us every step of the way. How can we be afraid?

Early-morning fire damages roof of Chicago's Holy Name Cathedral

BY MICHELLE MARTIN
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

CHICAGO — While parishioners stood and stared with tears in their eyes and firefighters continued to pour water on the roof of Holy Name Cathedral, Cardinal Francis E. George of Chicago told reporters the cathedral would "bounce back" from an early morning fire Feb. 4.

"Chicago has bounced back from fires before," said the cardinal. "We will bounce back from this." He spoke to the media after taking a tour inside the cathedral.

The blaze, which was of unknown origin and took firefighters two and a half hours to battle, was under control by 7:30 a.m. CST and reported to be out a half-hour later.

Fire officials reported there was significant water damage inside. Firefighters had punched holes in the roof to battle the blaze. There apparently was extensive damage to the cathedral's roof and attic.

Archdiocesan chancellor Jimmy Lago said the cathedral would likely be closed for months for repairs.

The fire apparently started in the attic area between the decorative wooden ceiling and the roof, in the area over the altar at the east end of the building. Because it broke out above the ceiling, the fire also was above the sprinkler system.

"The cathedral looks like the cathedral," the cardinal said, explaining what he saw when he went inside. "Until you see the icicles on the pews and the water on the floor and the water coming out of the electrical fixtures."

The five "galeros" — red hats belonging to the former cardinal archbishops of Chicago — were still hanging over the altar, Cardinal George said, although he could not say whether they had been damaged by water.

He also expressed relief no one was seriously injured and was grateful "the damage was not worse." One firefighter suffered a sprained back.

According to Father Dan Mayall, rector and pastor of Holy Name Cathedral, a worker who arrived around 5 a.m. reported the fire and set off alarms in the Smoke rises from the roof of Holy Name Cathedral in Chicago as firefighters work to put out a three-alarm fire the morning of Feb. 4. The fire, which broke out in the attic area between the ceiling and the roof, was reported by a worker shortly after 5 a.m. CST. Fire officials said that fire damage was confined to the roof and attic area, with water damage in the cathedral sanctuary and lower levels.

building. The pastor's chief of staff was notified, and he told the priests living in the rectory, which is a separate building attached to the cathedral.

The 11 priests who live there were evacuated as a precaution.

Father Mayall phoned the cardinal to alert him to the fire.

Repairs were being made in the area where the fire started. But workers had not been using blowtorches or anything else that would seem to create a fire hazard, and fire officials were "puzzled" as to the cause, the cardinal said.

Father Matthew Comptom, an associate pastor at the cathedral, was able to enter the sanctuary and remove the Eucharist from the tabernacle. He took it to a nearby chapel.

Mass was to be celebrated at its regularly scheduled times the weekend of Feb. 7-8 in the auditorium of the cathedral's parish center.

Holy Name Cathedral was built in 1875 to take the place of two churches that were destroyed in the great Chicago fire of 1871.

Pope John Paul II visited Holy Name during his 1979 visit to the United States. Italian tenor Luciano Pavarotti and the Chicago Symphony Orchestra performed in a concert that was part of the papal visit.

In 2003 a small fire, sparked by a Molotov cocktail, caused minor damage to Holy Name Cathedral. Police described the device as a plastic bottle filled with a flammable liquid and a lighted rag stuffed in the neck. It was tossed into the State Street vestibule of the cathedral just after noon.

A service was going on inside, but no one saw the person who threw the container. The 100 or so people in the cathedral at the time were alerted by passers-by who saw smoke. The device was quickly extinguished.

VATICAN CITY — Pope Benedict XVI and German Chancellor Angela Merkel spoke to each other on the telephone about the recent controversy surrounding a traditionalist bishop who has denied the Holocaust.

"It was a cordial and constructive conversation, marked by a common and profound agreement that the Shoah is a perpetually valid warning for humanity," said a statement released Feb. 8 by the spokesmen for the pope and for Merkel.

Jesuit Father Federico Lombardi, papal spokesman, said the conversation was marked by "a climate of great respect" and included mention

VATICAN CITY — Fasting from food and detaching oneself from material goods during Lent help believers open their hearts to God and open their hands to the poor, Pope Benedict XVI said.

The Lenten fast helps Christians "mortify our egoism and open our hearts to love of God and neighbor," said the pope in his message for Lent 2009.

The papal message for Lent, which begins Feb. 25 for Latin-rite Catholics, was released Feb. 3 at the Vatican.

HOLDING ONTO GOD'S GIFTS

Trish Stone (front) holds her 9-month-old son, Patrick, as he plays with his twin brother, Mark, held by Cubby LaHood at her home in Silver Spring, Md., Jan. 30. LaHood co-founded Isaiah's Promise, a support group for couples facing a troubled pregnancy. Stone met with LaHood during her pregnancy when she learned Mark would have severe disabilities.

Mother of twins lives out her belief in everyone's God-given dignity

SILVER SPRING, Md. (CNS) — Trish Stone is a firm believer in the sanctity of life. Although she comes by this naturally because of her Catholic upbringing, her belief also has been tested.

During a routine sonogram last year when Stone was expecting twins, she received "a look" from her doctor that something wasn't "quite right."

And after a whirlwind of tests that day, one of the twins was diagnosed with hydrocephalus, a condition that causes increased fluid pressure in the brain and swelling of the child's head that hinders normal neurological development.

Within the first hour of learning this news, Stone was advised to consider "selective reduction" — aborting the unhealthy twin to focus on the healthy one. She was told that if the unhealthy twin survived, he would not have any "quality of life."

Stone and her husband, Rich, had not been prepared for such a diagnosis. But there was no question that they would carry both babies to term despite fears of unknown future challenges.

"Thank God I grew up in a family with a strong faith. I knew in my heart that every life has a purpose," said Stone, who believed growing up with a sister with disabilities made this understanding all the more real.

Stone, a member of Holy Redeemer Church in Kensington, Md., said that more than anything she wanted to talk to people who had been through something similar. That's when she contacted Cubby LaHood, co-founder of Isaiah's Promise, a support group for couples facing difficult pregnancies.

She met with LaHood several times and the two discussed Stone's fears as well as practical concerns. After the twins were born, LaHood went to the hospital where Mark, the twin with hydrocephalus, was transferred for multiple brain surgeries.

Nine months later, the young mother said she has never let herself "go down the road of 'why me?'"

Instead, she said she relied on her faith "more than ever" as she prayed for the strength to face either Mark's death or his disability.

"I didn't pray for him to be perfect. I just prayed that I would have the strength," she said.

And that strength has come — amid the difficulties — in small ways.

For example, the morning she was scheduled to deliver the twins, the Stones attended Mass at their parish and the priest prayed for their family during the intentions. When Stone heard the parishioners join in praying for them, she said she felt a powerful assurance that "things were going to work out."

Today, Stone's daily life with a toddler and two babies, including one who requires a number of doctor appointments, therapy sessions and seizure medication, is nothing short of a challenge.

But watching him smile at his twin brother, she said she often considers taking him to visit the doctors who warned about his lack of "quality of life."

She also can't help but think that "his life will touch someone in some way."

Obama orders faith-based office be reworked, its scope expanded

WASHINGTON (CNS) — President Barack Obama created by executive order Feb. 5 a White House Office of Faith-Based and Neighborhood Partnerships, which will expand upon and rework the Bush administration's Office of Faith-Based and Community Initiatives.

The office's top priority, according to the White House release, will be "making community groups an integral part of our economic recovery and poverty a burden fewer have to bear when recovery is complete."

It also will focus on reducing demand for abortions, encouraging fathers to stand by their families and working with the National Security Council to "foster interfaith dialogue with leaders and scholars around the world."

In the same order, Obama created a new President's Advisory Council on Faith-Based and Neighborhood Partnerships, comprised of 25 leaders of religious and community organizations, including Father Larry Snyder, president of Catholic Charities USA, and Arturo Chavez, president of the Mexican American Catholic College in San Antonio.

The council will advise the White House and federal agencies on a range of topics, from hiring policies for private agencies that accept federal funds to how national security issues are affected by religious beliefs.

At the National Prayer Breakfast earlier the same day, Obama said the goal of the office "will not be to favor one religious group over another — or even religious groups over secular groups. It will simply be to work on behalf of those organizations that want to work on behalf of our communities, and to do so without blurring the line that our founders wisely drew between church and state."

He said such work is important because "few are closer to what's happening on our streets and in our neighborhoods than these organizations. People trust them. Communities rely on them. And we will help them."

Vatican official asks Europe to support Africa, Middle East

ROME (CNS) — European nations must do more to promote development and the end of violence in Africa, take an active role in promoting peace in the Holy Land and work for the good of their own citizens by protecting the traditional family, said Cardinal Tarcisio Bertone.

The cardinal, Pope Benedict XVI's top aide and secretary of state, met Feb. 10 with ambassadors to the Vatican from member nations of the European Union.

"You must fight the temptation to establish contacts with African nations with an exclusive aim of gaining the greatest possible profit," the cardinal told the ambassadors during the meeting at the Czech Embassy to the Holy See.

European involvement in Africa must aim instead at helping Africans become the protagonists of their own cultural, civic, economic and social development, he said. For that to happen, the nations need material assistance and encouragement to resolve the conflicts under way, address injustices and help the hundreds of thousands of refugees and displaced people.

Cardinal Bertone also urged the European Union and its member nations to take a more active role in pressing for a peaceful resolution of the ongoing tensions in the Holy Land.

Peace throughout the Middle East, he said, depends on resolving the Israeli-Palestinian conflict and that will happen only with the realization of the legitimate aspirations of both Israelis and Palestinians to live in peace and security in their own states.

As for the Gaza Strip, torn by fighting in late December and January, Cardinal Bertone said it was a priority "to guarantee the access of humanitarian aid destined for the civilian population" and to insist that both sides resolve their differences with negotiations, not violence.

Vatican conference will give intelligent design critical study

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — An upcoming Vatican-sponsored conference on evolution will include critical study of the theory of intelligent design, which, organizers said, represents poor theology and science.

While proponents of intelligent design were not invited to give presentations at the March 3-7 international conference, organizers agreed to discuss how it appeared and developed as a cultural ideology, not as science.

A number of presentations will discuss intelligent design's "long and complex genesis" in a historical context and its impact on society and culture because it is "certainly not discussable in the scientific, philosophic and theological fields," said Saverio Forestiero, zoology professor at Rome's Tor Vergata University and a member of the conference's organizing committee.

Forestiero was one of the speakers at a Vatican press conference Feb. 10 presenting the March event, titled "Biological Evolution: Facts and Theories."

The Pontifical Council for Culture, Rome's Pontifical Gregorian University and the University of Notre Dame in Indiana are organizing the international conference to mark the 150th anniversary of the publication of Charles Darwin's "The Origin of Species" and the 200th anniversary of his birth.

Jesuit Father Marc Leclerc, a philosophy professor at the Gregorian, said the conference was in no way a "celebration in honor of the English scientist." He said it would be an occasion to critically assess an event that permanently altered the history of science and changed the way people understand humanity.

The conference will look at "a correct exegesis" of biblical accounts of creation, said Father Leclerc.

Archbishop Gianfranco Ravasi, head of the Pontifical Council for Culture, said the author of Genesis was not trying to explain the scientific origins of nature, but rather to respond to the theological question "What meaning does mankind have in the cosmos?"

Father Leclerc said that "people of faith, even philosophers, can see God's presence" in the world and recognize he has a plan for humanity.

Church leaders urge Madagascar factions to talk after deadly violence

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Christian leaders in Madagascar have urged political factions to enter into dialogue after recent political violence, reported the Vatican's missionary news agency.

Fides reported Feb. 10 that Catholic Archbishop Odon Razanakolona of Antananarivo, president of the Forum of Christian Churches in Madagascar, "has sharply criticized" the bloodshed in which the presidential guard opened fire on demonstrators in the capital Antananarivo Feb. 7. The forum "has asked the two sides to enter into dialogue."

Pope Benedict XVI said Feb. 8 the bishops of the island designated that day as a day of prayer for reconciliation and social justice.

"Deeply concerned about the particularly critical moment the country is living through, I invite you to join Malagasy Catholics in entrusting to the Lord those who have died in the demonstrations and in asking him, through the intercession of the Blessed Virgin Mary, for the return of harmony among people, social tranquility and civil coexistence," the pope said.

More than 100 have died in political unrest since January.

Deacons, wives explore spirituality as part of continuing education

BY DEACON GERALD POTKAY
CORRESPONDENT

KANNAPOLIS — Permanent deacons recently examined how to foster and express spirituality for the good of themselves and the community.

Thirty-eight permanent deacons and wives took part in a continuing education class at St. Joseph Church in Kannapolis Feb. 7.

All active permanent deacons in the Diocese of Charlotte are required to participate in continuing education for spiritual and personal growth, as well as an annual retreat and an annual recommitment to the bishop.

The recent class was led by Oblate of St. Francis de Sales Father Joseph Zuschmidt, parochial vicar of Immaculate Heart of Mary Church in High Point.

Father Zuschmidt shared with the group the humility and spirituality of St. Francis de Sales, and the work of his fellow Oblates, a congregation of priests and brothers who base their spirituality on the saint's teachings.

The Oblates serve the church around the world as parish priests, chaplains, missionaries, teachers and more.

Father Zuschmidt told the group that Catholic spirituality is rooted firmly in the sacraments. It is through them, he said, "that we are able to live a holy life as devout or holy Catholics who are committed to the church, to ministry, to spouses and to children."

The beginning of all spirituality, said Father Zuschmidt, is the "recognition that there is something beyond 'me.'"

"For Christians, that something is Jesus Christ, who is the image of the living God," said Father Zuschmidt. "Jesus is the first and greatest sacrament, for he is the first outward sign given by God."

The second greatest sacrament, said Father Zuschmidt, "is the church, left here by Jesus."

"If we want to know who Jesus is, we must look to the church, which is the 'body of Christ' — the Christian community," he said.

Because God is in every event of our lives, said Father Zuschmidt, we each must have a "rule of life to prepare us for what will happen during the course of the day."

"Practice patience to confront those various opportunities each day presents. Then, worship God through private prayer and minister at home, as well as to others," he said.

"Above all, live Jesus so as to become a living sacrament with compassion, forgiveness and a prayerful relationship with God," he said. "That is a lifelong effort, which will reap its own rewards."

Deacon Walter Haarsgaard of Immaculate Heart of Mary Church in High Point said he "came to learn about the spirituality of St. Francis de Sales" but was "humbly reminded to address my own spirituality on a daily basis."

"I must go out every day and live my spirituality, even though I don't think about how it plays into everything we do," he said.

"I need to start making a reflection of the day — to cultivate my own life style, to make it grow so that I can live Jesus each day," he said.

The permanent diaconate is funded in part by contributions to the Diocesan Support Appeal. This year's DSA campaign runs Feb. 1 through March 8.

Did You Know?

A permanent deacon is an ordained minister permitted to preach; assist priests at the altar during the Liturgy of the Eucharist; officiate at weddings, baptisms and funerals; and administer blessings during certain liturgical rites.

The permanent deacon is the only ordained man allowed to be married. However, if a deacon's wife passes away, he is not allowed to remarry. If a man is single, he is not allowed to marry after ordination.

Firefighters come to rescue at Holy Angels Residents respond with gratitude for assistance

BELMONT — A burst water pipe recently caused quite the commotion at Holy Angels in Belmont.

The pipe burst in the evening of Jan. 17 in Moody Place, a 15-room intermediate care facility for residents of Holy Angels, a nonprofit corporation that provides services for children and adults with mental retardation and physical disabilities.

The rupture sent water gushing into the facility at 25 gallons per minute, forcing the evacuation of residents. The water ran directly to the emergency sprinkler head, activating the alarm and summoning the Belmont Fire Department.

The firefighters' quick response to shut off the water resulted in only 125 gallons of water being released. They then pitched in to help remove as much of the water as possible before leaving to answer another call.

"Although firemen are normally known for extinguishing fires with gallons of water, we found out rapidly how very helpful they can be in helping to remove the water," said Regina Moody, Holy Angels president and CEO.

"As a result of their rapid response, we don't even anticipate that the floor of the room where this happened will need to be replaced," she said.

Several of the firefighters later returned to offer further assistance, Moody added.

"The Belmont firemen who responded to Holy Angels that night were exemplary. Their commitment to the Belmont community, especially to Holy Angels is evident, not only on this day but many times prior," said Kerri Massey, Holy Angels chief program officer.

"They are truly heroes to the residents and staff of Holy Angels," she said.

Since the firefighters' dinner had been interrupted to respond to the Holy Angels alarm, Mercy Sister Nancy Nance, Holy Angels outreach services vice president, and Robert and Mike, Holy Angels residents, delivered soup and sandwiches from Cherubs Café.

The café, run by Holy Angels, provides vocational training and employment for residents.

While visiting the fire station, Robert and Mike were treated to a ride in the fire truck.

Remembering the Holocaust: A scientific fact, a religious obligation

Anti-Semitism condemned in clearest terms, Vatican official says

BY CINDY WOODEN
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

VATICAN CITY — Acknowledging and remembering the Holocaust is not only a matter of historical honesty; it is a religious obligation, especially for bishops, several Vatican officials said.

When Pope Benedict XVI publicly distanced himself from the Holocaust-denying views of traditionalist Bishop Richard Williamson and the Vatican Secretariat of State called on the bishop Feb. 4 to publicly disavow his views, they were not simply responding to a public uproar.

"Denial of the Holocaust by a person who should know better is indistinguishable from an anti-Semitic prejudice," said Bishop Brian Farrell, vice president of the Pontifical Commission for Religious Relations With the Jews.

"Anti-Semitism has been condemned by the Second Vatican Council in the clearest terms," he said.

Bishop Williamson is one of the four bishops whose excommunications were lifted in late January by Pope Benedict. The bishops had been excommunicated in 1988 after being ordained against papal orders by the late Archbishop Marcel Lefebvre.

Just a few days before the Vatican made public the fact that the pope had lifted the excommunications, a television interview with Bishop Williamson aired; in the interview he claimed that the Holocaust was exaggerated and that no Jews died in Nazi gas chambers.

At his weekly general audience Jan. 28, Pope Benedict affirmed the obligation to remember the Holocaust as a concrete example of "the unpredictable power of evil when it conquers the heart of man. May the Shoah be a warning for all against forgetfulness, denial or reductionism because violence committed against one single human being is violence against all."

A religious concern

Jesuit Father Federico Lombardi, the papal spokesman, said that to deny the Holocaust is to deny "the most obvious manifestation" of the presence of evil in the world.

"A religious person, a Christian must face the challenge to faith represented by this fact, by evil in the world," he told Catholic News Service Feb. 5.

Unless a person recognizes the reality and enormity of evil in the world, he or she cannot understand why Jesus had to die in order to ransom humanity, Father Lombardi said.

Denying the Holocaust is a sign of not understanding the reality of evil and, "therefore, of not living the faith," he said. "For this reason, it seems right to me that a bishop who denies the Shoah is better off growing potatoes or doing anything else, but not being a bishop."

Father Lombardi said denying the Holocaust "is an obvious error," but whether or not it is a sin depends on whether the person is conscious that it is erroneous and affirms it anyway.

"In that case, it is a serious sin of lying mixed, in addition, with components of racism and anti-Semitism," the papal spokesman said.

Bishop Farrell told CNS Feb. 5 that there are several reasons why "the Shoah is a religious concern."

First, he said, "every destruction of human dignity, every murder of a human being is an evil that goes against God's plan. In that sense, it is an issue for religion."

"There is a second reason that is much more specific to the Shoah and it is that the Shoah took place in the heart of what was supposedly the Christian continent, Europe," he said.

Prevailing attitudes

Rabbi David Rosen, chairman of the International Catholic-Jewish Liaison Committee, said there is a well-documented connection between centuries of Christian teaching of contempt for the Jews — blaming them for the death of Christ — and the atmosphere that allowed the Nazis' attempts to destroy European Jewry to nearly succeed.

"When the church declares anti-Semitism a sin against God and man, it is demonstrating a fundamental sea change in prevailing Catholic attitudes toward Jews," the rabbi told CNS. "Arguably nothing raises a question mark over that change as much as expressing or tolerating Holocaust denial."

In an article for the Vatican newspaper, L'Osservatore Romano, the Italian historian Anna Foa wrote that Holocaust denial is a lie cloaked in scientific jargon "to cover its true origins, its true motive: anti-Semitism."

Bishop Farrell said the testimony of the survivors of the Nazi death camps, the remains of the camps themselves and the meticulous documentation kept by the Nazis prove that the Holocaust and the death of 6 million Jews is a historical fact that can be denied "only through ignorance or prejudice."

"That is why it becomes an issue when a bishop, who should be a teacher of truth and of goodness, denies the Holocaust," he said.

"The fact that the pope asked the bishop to reject these opinions and to apologize for them results from the fact that a denial of the Holocaust by a person who should know better is indistinguishable from an anti-Semitic prejudice," Bishop Farrell said.

After visiting a Nazi death camp in Poland in 2006, Pope Benedict said, "May contemporary humanity never forget Auschwitz or the other 'death factories' where the Nazi regime attempted to eliminate God in order to replace him."

"May it not succumb to the temptation of racial hatred, which is at the root of the worst forms of anti-Semitism."

"May people recognize once again that God is the Father of all and calls us all, in Christ, to build a world of justice, truth and peace together."

Pope, German chancellor discuss Holocaust-denying bishop of Pope Benedict's Jan. 28 statement about the importance of remembering the Holocaust and Merkel's Feb. 3 request that the Vatican make it clear that it would not tolerate Holocaust denial.

The controversy began in late January when a television station aired a November interview with Bishop Richard Williamson, who was excommunicated in 1988 after being ordained against papal orders.

The late French Archbishop Marcel Lefebvre, who ordained him, and three other bishops ordained at the same ceremony also were excommunicated.

The interview aired just before the Vatican published the news that Pope Benedict had signed a decree lifting the excommunications of the four bishops.

The Vatican Secretariat of State issued a further statement Feb. 4, the day after Merkel's public request, stating that Bishop Williamson would not be received into full communion with the church unless he disavowed in "an absolutely unequivocal and public manner" his statement that reports of 6 million Jews dying in the Holocaust were an exaggeration and that no Jews died in Nazi gas chambers.

In an interview published Feb. 7 by the German magazine Der Spiegel, Bishop Williamson said he was willing to review the historical evidence about the Holocaust, and "if I find this evidence, I will correct myself. But that will take time."

Social separation

Bishop Williamson e-mailed Der Spiegel from Argentina where he had been the head of the seminary of the Society of St. Pius X in La Reja for the past five years.

The Argentine newspaper La Nacion reported Feb. 8 that Bishop Williamson has been removed as the rector of the seminary.

In an e-mail to the newspaper, Father Christian Bouchacourt, the society's South American district director, said Bishop Williamson had been removed from his duties, and he repeated the society's position that "the affirmations of Bishop Williamson do not reflect in any way the position of our congregation."

In the meantime, Father Davide Pagliarani, superior of the society's Italian district, issued a statement Feb. 6 saying that another Holocaust denier, Father Floriano Abrahamowicz, had been expelled from the Society of St. Pius X.

As the controversy surrounding Bishop Williamson grew in late January and early February, Father Abrahamowicz gave several interviews in which he, too, denied the Holocaust and in which he claimed that the Nazi gas chambers were used to disinfect inmates upon arrival at Nazi concentration camps.

The Society of St. Pius X was founded in 1969 by Archbishop Lefebvre. It does not accept the liturgical reforms of the Second Vatican Council and its concepts of religious freedom and ecumenism.

Reaffirming commitment

Pope Benedict was scheduled to meet Feb. 12 with more than 60 U.S. Jewish leaders, members of the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations.

A Vatican official told Catholic News Service Feb. 9 that the group had requested the papal audience before the Bishop Williamson controversy erupted, but that obviously the German-born pope would use the occasion to reaffirm his respect for the Jews and his position that the Holocaust was real and that it was a horrific proof of the existence of evil.

Top officers of the World Jewish Congress met at the Vatican Feb. 9 with Cardinal Walter Kasper, president of the Pontifical Commission for Religious Relations With the Jews.

Ronald S. Lauder, president of the congress, said in a statement that he and the other officers told Cardinal Kasper that the Vatican's insistence that Bishop Williamson recant "was a welcome first step," but that concrete actions must be taken to emphasize that the Catholic Church itself will not tolerate "accommodating anti-Semites."

Lauder said he hoped the pope would be able to make his planned May visit to Jordan, Israel and the Palestinian territories.

"We are looking forward to the pope's visit to the Holy Land," he said. "This will be an opportunity to reaffirm the Vatican's commitment to dialogue with Jews."

Vatican says Englaro's death must lead to better ways to protect life

BY CINDY WOODEN
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

VATICAN CITY — The Feb. 9 death of Eluana Englaro after nutrition and hydration were withheld should lead Italian citizens and their government to find more effective ways to protect and promote human life, said the Vatican spokesman.

"In the name of Eluana we must continue to seek more effective ways to serve life," said Jesuit Father Federico Lombardi, the Vatican spokesman.

Englaro, who had been in a persistent vegetative state for more than 17 years, died at a private clinic in Udine, Italy, less than a week after her doctors, with the support of her father, began withholding nutrition and hydration.

By Feb. 7, doctors said she was receiving only sedatives.

News of her death interrupted an Italian parliamentary debate on an emergency measure to make it illegal to withhold nutrition and hydration from patients who are disabled or in a persistent vegetative state; the measure would have forced Englaro's doctors to begin giving her nutrients and water again.

Vatican officials repeatedly have said that the provision of nutrition and hydration is an obligatory, basic part of caring for a person who cannot care for him or herself; it is not an extraordinary means of keeping someone alive and cannot be withdrawn.

During his Feb. 8 Angelus address, Pope Benedict XVI did not mention Englaro by name, but he offered prayers for "all of the sick, especially those in a most serious condition who cannot provide for themselves in any way, but are totally dependent on the care of others. May each of them experience, through the care of those who are close to them, the power of the love of God and the richness of his saving grace."

Englaro, 38, was seriously injured in a car accident in January 1992. After she had been in a persistent vegetative state for five years, her father began a legal battle to win permission to withdraw the nasogastric tube through which she was being provided nutrition and hydration.

In a commentary on Vatican Radio Feb. 10, Father Lombardi said, "In the face of her death, believers gather in prayer and entrust to the Lord the soul of Eluana, a person whom we love and who has become part of our lives in the last few months."

"Now that Eluana is at peace, we hope that her situation — after so much discussion — will be a motive for calm reflection and for a responsible search for better ways to accompany the weakest people with all due respect for the rights to life, love and attentive care," he said.

Cardinal Javier Lozano Barragan, president of the Pontifical Council for Health Care Ministry, told reporters Feb. 9 that the Christian response to Englaro's death must be to pray that God "would open the gates of heaven to her after she suffered so much on earth."

He also said he was praying that God would "forgive those who brought her to this point. And I invite everyone to pray in the spirit of forgiveness."

In November Italy's supreme court upheld a lower court ruling that Englaro's care could be interrupted because of the "extraordinary duration" of her condition and because she had made it clear before the accident that she would not want her life artificially prolonged.

Once the court ruled, Englaro's father spent several months trying to find a private clinic that would accept her as a patient, but not continue giving her nutrition and hydration.

She had been in a clinic run by the Misericordine Sisters, who not only refused to withhold food and water, but also made it clear they wanted to continue caring for Englaro.

Hospitals won't comply with unjust laws and won't close, bishop says

ST. PETERSBURG, Fla. (CNS) — The Catholic Health Association's board of trustees recently reaffirmed its opposition to any attempts by Congress or President Barack Obama to broaden abortion access and its commitment to keep Catholic hospitals open, Bishop Robert N. Lynch of St. Petersburg said in a Feb. 6 blog entry.

"Idle threats about the certain closing of Catholic hospitals if certain things happen are simply that — idle," said the bishop and CHA board member, writing about the board's Feb. 4-6 retreat in the St. Petersburg area.

"We are here today and will be here tomorrow to provide the healing hand of Christ to others as long as we can financially survive in a challenging situation and comply fully with our ethical and religious directives," he added in his blog on the diocese's Web site.

The U.S. bishops' "Ethical and Religious Directives for Catholic Health Care Services" guide Catholic health care facilities in addressing ethical questions such as abortion, euthanasia, care for the poor, medical research and other issues.

Although the CHA gathering "was essentially a planning retreat," the board re-emphasized "some actions taken at previous meetings," Bishop Lynch said.

CHA "will join with the church and all other pro-life parties to vigorously oppose any and all attempts by this Congress or administration to broaden abortion access," he said.

"Catholic hospitals will not allow abortions to be performed in their facilities" and will not comply with any laws mandating abortion or other procedures that violate the ethical and religious directives, "even if our actions constitute civil disobedience," he added.

"No Catholic institution or employee of an institution can or will be made to violate the dictates of their conscience resulting from federal or state legislative action," Bishop Lynch said.

He said Catholic hospitals "won't comply" with laws that violate conscience "but we will not close."

Among the reasons he cited were that:

— Catholic hospitals are sometimes the sole provider of health care in a large geographical area, especially in rural areas.

— The hospitals have an obligation to their physicians, nurses and other employees; to their bondholders; and "to the poor, unprotected and to our communities which benefit from our presence."

about the case until Feb. 5 when he announced his government was issuing a decree to stop Englaro's doctors from withdrawing nutrition and hydration.

But Italian President Giorgio Napolitano refused to sign the decree, saying it was constitutionally questionable, and encouraged parliamentary action instead.

Cardinal Tarcisio Bertone, Vatican secretary of state, had a telephone conversation with Napolitano Feb. 7 to discuss the Englaro case.

The Vatican said Cardinal Bertone expressed his "deep appreciation for the speed with which the Parliament was preparing to approve the bill."

Berlusconi's government Feb. 6 introduced the bill in Parliament to make it illegal to withhold nutrition and hydration in cases like Englaro's.

When her death was announced, Berlusconi told reporters: "I feel great sadness. I am deeply disappointed that the government's action to save a life was made impossible."

"I did everything I could and it is not my fault that the culture of death won and not the culture of life," the prime minister said.

After Englaro's death, members of Parliament were debating whether to continue working on the emergency legislation or to return to parliamentary committees to continue work on broader bills dealing with end-of-life issues.

Young Catholic returns from year of volunteering abroad

St. James the Greater Church in Concord.

"Hearing other people talk about their own experiences, that made me really want to do it," she said.

"I decided I didn't want to just go straight into graduate school or a job," said Auger. "I new I wanted to do something; I just wasn't sure what."

Fast forward three years and Auger has just returned from a year of volunteering in the Dominican Republic.

This weekend Feb. 13-16, she will attend the fifth annual "Give Your Heart Away" community service weekend at the Catholic Conference Center in Hickory. But this time she will be the one giving a first-hand account of her experience.

Good Samaritani

Auger first traveled to the Dominican Republic on a two-week medical mission last January with a group called Intercultural Nursing.

She assisted the group of nurses at a medical clinic in a remote area on the western part of the island near the border of Haiti.

While there, she was introduced to Sister of St. Joseph Beatrice Barry from Long Island, N.Y., who has been serving the sick of the Dominican Republic for the past 30 years.

Sister Barry offered Auger a spot serving at her medical hospitality house, La Posada del Buen Samaritano, or "The Inn of the Good Samaritan."

Within two-weeks of returning home from the medical mission, Auger boarded a plane and went back.

"This was the craziest decision I've ever made in my life, but I couldn't imagine not going back," said Auger. "You don't say no to something like that."

In this January 2008 photo, Stephanie Auger is seen interpreting for a nurse at a clinic in Elías Piña, a small town on the border of Haiti and the Dominican Republic. house, Auger worked closely with sick people from both the Dominican Republic and Haiti.

Auger lived in the house with Sister Barry and anywhere from 15 to 20 patients at time, mostly children with cancer, HIV, AIDS, severe burns or orthopedic problems.

The most rewarding part of the experience was "the relationships I formed with the kids in the house," said Auger.

There was one child in particular, Alberto, a 16-year-old Haitian who was being treated for lymphoma.

"He was the love of my life," Auger said. "We really bonded."

Auger received daily Spanish tutoring for the first two-and-a-half months of her stay. But for the most part, she wasn't given a lot of time to ease into her surroundings. Driving in Santo Domingo definitely took some getting used to.

"There's no rules," she said jokingly, and "they don't pay attention to the lights."

Her daily responsibilities included driving patients to hospitals, clinics and labs; food shopping; and buying medication.

"If they were kids and they couldn't really talk to the doctor, I would talk for them," she said.

Adjusting and focusing

When Auger speaks at "Give Your Heart Away" this weekend, she plans to share how the experience has impacted her life.

"It's changed me, in a good way," she said.

She wants the students to know how fulfilling a volunteer experience, like the one she had, can be.

Although she credits the good work of the many domestic volunteer organizations here in the United States, she said there is definitely something to be gained from living abroad.

"I think it's really important for people to leave the United States to see how other people live," she said. "You become so appreciative of everything you have."

Auger is also likely to share some of the challenges she encountered while living in a developing country — such as not being able to drink the water, take hot showers or flush toilet paper down the toilet.

"I ate rice and beans almost every day for a year," she said.

And she had to adapt culturally.

"It's hard to be a woman, especially an American woman in the Dominican Republic," said Auger who had a difficult time blending in with her tall frame, fair skin, blue eyes and blonde hair.

"It was hard adjusting to all the attention I was getting as a white person," she said.

Her experience also has changed her plans for the future.

"Before, I wasn't really thinking about any kind of job where I would be serving others," she said.

Now, she is considering going to nursing school or graduate school for international studies.

Sowing seeds

Whether she goes into the medical profession, works for a nonprofit organizations or immigration services, she knows that she wants a job that is focused on helping others.

"In campus ministry we sow seeds of faith, hope and justice, and we pray that our students will answer the call to do more for our church," said Mary Wright, director of diocesan campus ministry.

"Stephanie (Auger) is a great example of a student saying 'yes' and giving back to the community through service," she said.

This year approximately 70 college students from around the diocese are expected to participate in the "Give Your Heart Away" weekend.

On Saturday the students will take part in a variety of service projects at several locations in the Hickory area.

Afterwards, they will have a chance to reflect on the service projects in the context of Catholic social teaching, as well as spend time in prayer and fellowship.

On Sunday there will be a panel discussion on living a life of service, at which time Auger will share her story.

Contact Staff Writer Katie Moore by calling (704) 370-3354, or e-mail kmmore@charlottediocese.org.

A look at Lent

The Angelotti family prays before sharing a meatless meal at their home in Centreville, Va., Feb. 4. They have made Operation Rice Bowl a centerpiece on the family table during Lent. The nationwide alms-giving program coordinated by encourages participants to learn about hunger and poverty around the globe and then to make donations to help those most in need.

A general introduction to the season

Lent is the season the Catholic Church gives us to take stock and review our lives, to root out all that is not good and true and replace it with the faithful and the holy.

In these 40 days, the Catholic Church turns to the ancient penitential practices of fasting, almsgiving and prayer. These practices remain as rich and life-giving in the year 2009 as they were when practiced by the early Christians and by our Jewish forbearers.

Fasting reminds us of our hunger for God, which no worldly thing can satisfy. Almsgiving reminds us that love of God and love of neighbor are inextricably intertwined, and that we bear responsibility for each other. Prayer reminds us to center our lives on God who alone gives meaning to all we do.

Lent is a most special time. The liturgies and devotions of Lent call us to a kind of spiritual "spring cleaning," identifying relationships that are disordered and sins that imprison and then seeking forgiveness and healing.

We root out the darkness of sin so as to enter the Easter mysteries with a clean heart bathed in the healing, life-giving light of Christ.

Guidelines for Lent

1) The time of Lent is to be observed by Catholics as a special season of prayer, penance and works of charity.

2) Ash Wednesday, Feb. 25, and Good Friday, April 10, in particular, are the most important penitential days of the liturgical year. They are days of both fast and abstinence. All Fridays in Lent are days of abstinence.

3) The rule of fasting states that only one full meal a day can be taken. Two small meals, "sufficient to maintain strength," are allowed, but together they should not equal another full meal.

Eating between meals breaks the fast, but drinking liquids does not. The rule of fasting binds all Catholics from age 18 to 59.

4) Abstinence refers to the eating of meat. Under the present law, it does not include egg or milk products, meat stock soups or gravies. The rule of abstinence binds all Catholics 14 years old and older.

5) The substantial observance of the laws of fast and abstinence is a serious obligation. Those whose work or health would be impaired are excused from fasting and abstaining.

The individual conscience can decide if there is a proper cause to excuse. A more serious reason should be present to excuse from Ash Wednesday and Good Friday penance.

6) Self-imposed fasting on the other weekdays of Lent is recommended. Abstinence on all Fridays of the year is also highly recommended.

The 1983 war and peace pastoral letter of the U.S. bishops, stating that prayer is incomplete without penance, urges Friday abstinences as something all American Catholics should offer up for the sake of world peace.

7) Parents and teachers should see to it that even those who are not bound by the laws of fasting and abstinence because of age are brought up in an atmosphere that is conducive to a sense of penance.

8) The faithful should be clearly and positively encouraged to receive the sacrament of reconciliation during Lent. There should be adequate time scheduled for confessions before Easter.

Group reconciliation services should not be scheduled for the last days of the Holy Week. At no time is it permitted to schedule a group reconciliation service for the purpose of giving general absolution without individual confessions.

9) The liturgical directions of the Sacramentary and the Lectionary must be faithfully observed regarding all the special Holy Week rites.

10) Funeral Masses are not allowed on Holy Thursday, Good Friday or Holy Saturday. The funeral rite outside of Mass can be held either in church or at the chapel on those days, with a funeral Mass later.

11) The RCIA is incorporated into the liturgy during Lent. The rite of election is celebrated on the first Sunday of Lent. On the third, fourth and fifth Sundays of Lent, the Scrutinies take place during Mass.

To transform the world

Operation Rice Bowl a way to help poor during Lent

Catholic Relief Services (CRS) is the U.S. bishops' international aid and development agency. Founded in 1943 to assist the displaced populations of war-torn Europe, CRS now brings humanitarian relief efforts to poor people in nearly 100 countries.

Inspired by the loving message of Jesus Christ in all its works, CRS invites the U.S. Catholic community to join in its mission to respond to natural disasters, combat poverty, bring clean water to villages, help farmers grow the food needed for their families and communities, and fight illnesses such as malaria, tuberculosis and AIDS.

Working closely with the U.S. bishops, CRS promotes a vision of human dignity, human development and peace building consistent with the moral vision espoused by the Catholic Church. All people — without regard to race, religion or nationality — are recipients of the charitable efforts of CRS. And such efforts are very effective, with 94 percent of each dollar donated to CRS going directly to programs.

CRS also is a determined advocate on Capitol Hill for the world's poor, making sure members of Congress address the global scourges of disease, hunger and poverty. CRS lobbies the government on behalf of initiatives based on Catholic moral principles that are designed to bring relief to millions of people worldwide.

An example of such an initiative is the U.S. President's Emergency Plan for AIDS Relief (PEPFAR), which enables many people worldwide to receive life-saving medical treatments.

I believe very strongly in the work of CRS. Since 1997, I have worked as a volunteer with the Diocese of Charlotte's Office of Justice and Peace, a component of Catholic Social Services, on the Diocesan CRS Advisory Committee.

This committee is comprised of volunteers from across the diocese who promote CRS's work and disaster relief appeals, and, importantly, encourage participation in CRS's Operation Rice Bowl.

During Lent, Operation Rice Bowl participants pledge to pray, fast in solidarity with those around the world who suffer from hunger, learn about the global community and the challenges of poverty overseas, and give sacrificial contributions to those in need.

With Lent just around the corner, parishes nationwide are preparing for the 2009 Operation Rice Bowl collection —

CRS's primary fundraising mechanism.

This year's theme is "Solidarity Will Transform the World." Of the funds raised through Operation Rice Bowl, the majority goes through CRS headquarters in Baltimore, Md., to fund international development projects. A smaller portion remains in the Diocese of Charlotte to provide funding for the $1,000 Operation Rice Bowl mini-grants that support local hunger and poverty-alleviation efforts.

The Diocesan CRS Advisory Committee evaluates the applications for these grants. This past fall, eight parishes received mini-grants.

CRS is making changes for the better in communities worldwide. I encourage you to learn more about CRS (www.crs.org) and its many programs. If you are a parent or educator, or if you just want to broaden your children's knowledge of global issues, consider visiting the CRS education Web site (<http://education.crs.org>) for valuable educational resources.

In his 2009 World Day of Peace Message, Pope Benedict XVI called Catholics worldwide to build peace by fighting poverty. In solidarity, the U.S. bishops and CRS will launch the Catholics Confront Global Poverty Campaign Feb. 23.

I hope you will join me, and thousands of other Catholics, in responding to this campaign's invitation to learn about global poverty issues. The diocesan Office of Justice and Peace will share details of this campaign with parishes in early March.

Please pray with me for the hundreds of millions of people suffering from a lack of life's most basic necessities. I encourage you to be generous to those in need in our own communities and around the world. And please be a voice for the voiceless by advocating for policies that benefit our brothers and sisters worldwide.

Deacon Konarski is a permanent deacon and Operation Rice Bowl coordinator at St. Charles Borromeo Church in Morganton.

Pope says fasting in Lent opens hearts to God

LENT, from page 1

Council Cor Unum, the Vatican's office for promoting and coordinating charity, told reporters that Christian fasting brings together love for God and love for neighbor.

"The pope reminds us of our obligation to open our hearts and our hands to those in need," he said at the Vatican presentation of the message.

The Vatican invited Josette Sheeran, the U.N.'s World Food Program executive director, to help present the papal message.

"Serving the hungry is a moral call that unites people of all faiths," said Sheeran, whose organization relies heavily on Catholic charities and other faith-based organizations to distribute food aid. "At this time of worldwide economic challenges, let us not forget that the food and financial crises hit the world's most vulnerable the hardest. Since 2007, 115 million were added to the ranks of the hungry to create a total of nearly 1 billion people without adequate food."

Sheeran said that at a time when the U.S. and other governments are announcing multitrillion-dollar packages to bailout banks, car companies and other industries, the World Food Program is asking that 0.7 percent of all stimulus plans be dedicated to hunger relief.

"Financial rescue packages must serve not only Wall Street and Main Street, but also the places with no streets," she said.

Cardinal Cordes and Sheeran agreed that the financial bailout plans are necessary not just for helping the world's richest nations, but also for preventing a worsening situation in poor countries dependent on exports, on development aid and on the money their citizens working abroad send home to support their families.

"If the financial system fails completely, it will hurt the poor first," Cardinal Cordes said.

'The deepest hunger'

In his message, Pope Benedict said the Lenten practices of prayer, fasting and almsgiving are meant to help Christians focus on God and prepare for the Easter celebration of Jesus' victory over sin and death.

Focusing his message specifically on the practice of fasting, the pope said it is a way for believers to submit themselves "humbly to God, trusting in his goodness and mercy."

"Denying material food, which nourishes our body, nurtures an interior disposition to listen to Christ and be fed by his saving word," the pope wrote.

"Through fasting and prayer we allow him to come and satisfy the deepest hunger that we experience in the depths of our being: the hunger and thirst for God," he said.

While some people fast to cleanse their body or to lose weight, Christians fast during Lent in order "to heal all that prevents them from conformity to the will of God," he said.

"Freely chosen detachment from the pleasure of food and other material goods helps the disciple of Christ to control the appetites of nature, weakened by original sin," the pope wrote.

At the same time, he said, "fasting is an aid to open our eyes to the situation in which so many of our brothers and sisters live."

By fasting in solidarity with the poor, "freely embracing an act of self-denial for the sake of another, we make a statement that our brother or sister in need is not a stranger," the pope said.

U.N. statistics reveal extent of world hunger

VATICAN CITY — In his 2009 Lenten message Pope Benedict XVI said the spiritual practice of fasting also should lead to concrete action on behalf of the hungry.

"Fasting is an aid to open our eyes to the situation in which so many of our brothers and sisters live," the pope said in the message released at the Vatican Feb. 3.

The Vatican invited Josette Sheeran, executive director of the World Food Program, to its press conference presenting the message.

The following are statistics on world hunger from the World Food Program and the Office of the U.N. Secretary-General:

— In 2008, the number of undernourished people in the world rose to 963 million (more than the combined populations of the United States, Canada and the European Union), up 40 million from 2007.

— The majority of undernourished people live in developing countries, with about 65 percent of the total living in India, China, Democratic Republic of Congo, Bangladesh, Indonesia, Pakistan and Ethiopia.

— Hunger and malnutrition are the No. 1 risk to health worldwide, greater than AIDS, malaria and tuberculosis combined.

— Hunger does not affect just the individual. Economists estimate that every child whose physical and mental development is stunted by hunger and malnutrition stands to lose 5 percent to 10 percent in lifetime earnings.

— The total food surplus of the United States alone could satisfy every empty stomach in Africa; France's leftovers could feed the hungry in Democratic Republic of Congo and Italy's could feed Ethiopia's undernourished.

— Today 25,000 people will die from hunger. A child dies every six seconds of malnutrition or starvation.

— A number of factors, including high energy and fertilizer costs, sent global food prices soaring to all-time highs in 2008. In March the price of rice hit a 19-year high while wheat climbed to its highest level in 28 years.

However the price of staple foods throughout the world has declined over the last few months.

— Food riots erupted in the spring of 2008 in Haiti, Mexico and Senegal. The World Bank estimated that social unrest, as a consequence of the world food crisis, could spread to 33 countries.

Although riots have eased in recent months, at a meeting in Madrid, Spain, Jan. 26, Ban Ki-moon, U.N. secretary-general, urged wealthy nations not to ignore the shocking problem of world hunger.

— There is enough food in the world today for everyone to have the nourishment necessary for a healthy and productive life.

Moving book tells troubling tale of mass shootings of Jews in Ukraine

REVIEWED BY EUGENE J. FISHER
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

"The Holocaust by Bullets" is one of the most moving, troubling and insightful books on the Holocaust, or for that matter any other subject, that I have ever read.

Father Patrick Desbois is a French priest of humble background who is an adviser to the French bishops and to the Holy See for Catholic-Jewish relations.

His interest in the dialogue with Jews and in the Holocaust was sparked by his grandfather, who had been a prisoner of war during World War II interned by the Germans in Ukraine and who, in telling the story of his own sufferings to his grandson, insisted that it was much worse for "the others."

"The others," it turned out, were the Jews, who, relatively early in the war in German-occupied Ukraine, were murdered, not by the anonymous millions in concentration camps away from the eyes of the public, but by the scores in town squares and fields in front of their horrified non-Jewish neighbors, friends who were often forced to facilitate the massacres by digging the ditches and covering over the mass graves that to this day dot the landscape of an entire country.

Until Father Desbois and his courageous team spent much of the past decade traveling around the country from village to village, interviewing the townsfolk, most of whom were children at the time of the killings, the graves were unmarked, destined it would seem for oblivion.

Now the sites are carefully plotted, their positions marked exactly by GPS, with the approximate number of the victims interred there and with eyewitness stories recorded and cross-referenced with archival materials from German and Soviet records.

The book is written simply in the first person, narrating how the author became interested in and then, in the best moral sense, obsessed by his mission.

It details the development by his small team of a methodology to interview witnesses and, by analyzing the number of bullets found in a given area, computing the approximate number of victims buried where they had fallen.

Some of the passages, in their stark simplicity, sear the soul of the reader. Visiting a neat, well-kept German cemetery in Lublin, Poland, for example, shortly after visiting a Jewish grave site in which they saw "nothing that resembled a cemetery," Father Desbois comments:

"While the mass graves of the thousands of Jews who were shot are untraceable, every German killed during the war has been reburied and identified by name. The cemeteries are on the scale of the Reich. Magnificent cemeteries for the Germans ... absolutely nothing for the Jews.

"Thus, under the ground, everything is still in order according to the hierarchy of the Reich. We cannot give a posthumous victory to Nazism. We cannot leave the Jews buried like animals. We cannot accept this state of affairs and allow our continent to be built upon the obliterated memory of the victims of the Reich."

This is not to say that the book is a sad one. Rather, it radiates a sense of redemption.

In interviewing the witnesses to the mass shootings of Jews in their villages, Father Desbois allows them, most for the first time since they witnessed the horrors in which they took part, to speak of what happened, to have it recorded for posterity.

Many were conscripted into digging the pits into which the Jews were herded and shot. Then they were forced to cover over the pits, throwing thin layers of earth over multiple layers of the dead bodies of the conscripts' neighbors and friends.

In the interviews, the witnesses had to relive the horror, but in telling it, they were finally freed from some of its heavy burden.

One elderly woman, for example, confessed that she and two friends were forced "to walk on the bodies of the people who were shot after every volley of shots. We were three Ukrainian girls who, in our bare feet, had to pack down the bodies of the Jews and throw a fine layer of sand on top of them so that other Jews could lay down (to be shot in turn)."

The volume is graced with 16 pages of excellent photographs of the sites, the digging and, above all, the faces of the witnesses, as well as several transcripts of testimonies. One finishes this book with new understandings of familiar words such as evil, shame, hope and grace.

Fisher is retired associate director of the U.S. bishops' Secretariat for Ecumenical and Interreligious Affairs and recently received the Shevet Achim Award for Outstanding Contributions to Jewish-Christian Understanding from the Council of Centers on Jewish-Christian Relations.

God's presence helps us leave past behind, focus on future

BY JEFF HEDGLEN
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

The past has such an allure for us, especially as we get older. We love to tell stories of how it was "back in the day." Whenever we gather with old friends, we tell and retell the same stories as though they had happened just last week.

For some, the past is so much a part of their lives that they seem to constantly relive it, be it the glory days of high school and college, their home town or even the physical shape they once had.

For others, the history they carry with them is a burden. These people sometimes wallow in the past. The hard and painful times tend to hold on as though affixed to the soul with superglue.

We are, for sure, a product of our previous experiences. But we do not have to be defined by them.

In this weekend's first reading, God says through the prophet Isaiah: "Remember not the events of the past, the things of long ago consider not; see, I am doing something new!"

God is all about the here and now. Even the name God reveals to us in Exodus is "I am who am," not "I was" or "I will be" but I AM. This shows us that God is eternally present, and he is calling us to meet him where he is.

For me and a lot of people I know, one aspect of the past that continues to nag, pull and at times bring guilt is the sins I have committed. Even those I have taken to confession tend to creep back into my mind and try to drag me down.

But here again God's mercy shines through in the words of Isaiah: "I ... wipe out ... your offenses; your sins I remember no more."

God's eternal presence and unfailing forgiveness can give us the strength we need to leave the past behind. It's not that God is saying we are to deny our past or even forget it, but that we must avoid allowing the days behind us to dictate the ones before us.

If we hold too tight to yesterday we might miss what God is doing right now, and if God is doing it, it is sure to be a good thing.

Questions:

What "new thing" is God doing in your life these days? What things from the past are hard for you to let go of? In what ways do you see God as being eternally present?

Scripture to be Illustrated:

"Remember not the events of the past, the things of long ago consider not; see, I am doing something new!" (Isaiah 43:18-19)

Spiritual guidance online

Content of popular Catholic Web site put out in book, sent to pastors

BY CHAZ MUTH
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

WASHINGTON — In the 10 years since Creighton University in Omaha, Neb., began offering ministry guidance and aids on its Web site, the technology has exploded and so has the audience of the Catholic Web site, which received more than 21 million hits in the past year.

The site has become so popular that a Catholic publishing house in Chicago has published some of the content in book form and sent a complimentary copy to every Catholic parish in the United States.

"I know that it may sound a little odd that a book would come out of stuff from a Web site, and not the other way around," said Jesuit Father Andy Alexander, one of the founders of the Web site that inspired the book.

"But we're hoping to expand our audience, and this book will help, especially if parishes begin using it," he said.

The book, "Praying Lent: Renewing Our Lives on the Lenten Journey," is a guide for Catholics about how to celebrate an often misunderstood season.

Father Alexander and Maureen Waldron — staff members of the Jesuit-run university's Collaborative Ministry Office — set up the Creighton University Web site in 1998 to provide daily reflections for the faculty and staff to help them understand the school's mission.

During Lent that year the daily reflections focused on the 40 days leading up to Easter and provided information about what that period means to Catholics and what the church expects from them.

"At the end of Lent of 1998, when we first went online with daily reflections, a woman wrote to us and said she was visiting Hong Kong and heard about our site from a priest from Baltimore and told us how much our postings meant to her during her time overseas," Waldron said.

"That's when it occurred to us, 'We're not just a campus ministry. We're reaching out globally,'" she said.

As they added faculty and staff to their roster of daily reflection writers, they also started hearing from more people from all corners of the planet.

"We started to realize two things," Father Alexander said. "People were very hungry for spiritual guidance, and the World Wide Web is a very powerful tool."

With little technical savvy or computer training 10 years ago, Father Alexander, now 60, and Waldron, now 55, learned the ins and outs of Web site design and maneuvering using the trial-and-error method.

Over the years they have added online translations of spiritual exercises from St. Ignatius, established interactive retreats, posted Lenten recipes, installed audio downloads, provided Advent instructions for Catholics, given advice for dealing with grief and created a weekly guide for daily prayer, Father Alexander said.

"People kept saying they were too busy to pray," he said. "So this reviews all of the readings of the week and instructs people how to practice their faith. For lack of a better phrase, it's religion for the busy person."

However, the online ministry isn't a substitute for Mass, Father Alexander said.

"It's not replacing church," he said. "This is spirituality online. It helps people strengthen their relationship with God when they are not in church."

Since they were hearing from people from Saudi Arabia to Siberia, Father Alexander and Waldron translated some of the retreats into Spanish, Japanese and Russian.

"Loyola Press started watching our numbers, and even though they said they had never published anything that had already been available for free, the numbers were staggering," Father Alexander said.

"They asked us if they could put our online retreats in books, so that people can have them in hand," he said.

The book will be handy for people who are traveling without Internet access, or for those who just haven't embraced the new technology, said Michelle Halm, a Loyola Press spokeswoman.

"We saw how the retreat on Lent inspired so many people to sign onto their Web site," Halm said. "We thought it would be great to put that information into a book to reach even a broader audience."

"It's very practical and hands-on. It even has recipes and (information on) how to make the most of Lent. We wanted to get it into more hands," she said.

Since Loyola Press would also like to see pastors all over the United States use this book as an instructional guide for members of their congregation, the company has sent every parish in the country a complimentary copy along with inexpensive order deals, she said.

"This would be ideal for a prayer group, or a special Lenten instruction group," Halm said.

Msr. Damien Nalepa, pastor of St. Gregory the Great Church in Baltimore, received his copy during Advent and decided to read it sometime in January. However, the idea of a book to help guide members of his congregation through the practical aspects of Lent intrigued him.

"I like the idea," he said. "This is the kind of tool that I think would be valuable for our parishioners. I am always looking for tools to help Catholics really understand Lent."

A second book containing information from Creighton University's online ministry site, which can be found at www.creighton.edu/CollaborativeMinistry/online.html, is planned for the near future, most likely as a guide for Advent, Halm said.

Spanish-born contemporary artist Maria Tarruella poses in front of her painting, "John 8:12" in Philadelphia Feb. 4. Her exhibition, titled "Hope," contains 13 layered-collage pieces depicting images of God's presence in our daily lives.

Artist hopes her art opens people's hearts to God's love

BY JACKIE TAYLOR
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

WASHINGTON — Contemporary artist Maria Tarruella hopes her first U.S. exhibit can open the hearts of people around her to the love of God.

"He knows who he has to communicate to. I hope I'm humble enough and open enough to hear his voice and listen to where he wants to take me," she stated.

"In my work, I ask the Lord to come bless me and use me. The art comes from a conversation between us," Tarruella said in a telephone interview with Catholic News Service.

Her exhibition, titled "Hope," contains 13 layered collage pieces depicting images of God's presence in our daily lives. The exhibition will debut Feb. 27 at White Stone Gallery in Philadelphia.

St. Teresa of Avila, a 16th-century mystic, served as an inspiration for Tarruella's art. She said she admired the saint's ability to combine mysticism and a businesslike attitude in her life.

"We always have our daily fights and it's about seeing how we can give our day-to-day lives to the Lord and let him come into our minute, little paths in life," said Tarruella.

Living in the United States for a little more than a year, Tarruella said she noticed a different attitude toward religion in the States.

"People in Europe are much more reserved about their faith. Speaking about religion is quite personal and private. People are taken aback if you speak openly about God," she noted.

Tarruella admires the fact that Americans speak much more candidly about faith in God.

Born in the predominantly Catholic country of Spain, Tarruella rarely practiced her faith growing up.

She experienced a renewal of her faith during a 1989 encounter with the late Pope John Paul II in Santiago, Chile. Hearing the pope's words, Tarruella felt an intense heat in her heart and recognized the sensation as a sign to communicate God's message to others.

For the "Hope" exhibit, Tarruella created layered pieces, using wax, acrylic paint, metallic paint, tissue paper, iron powder and ashes on raw linen canvas. Each material is symbolic of Tarruella's faith.

"Our daily life is filled with information, junk mail, bills, papers and notes. I would get a pile of coupons from the cashier at the grocery store and just crumple them up and throw them away. Then I thought that cashier had cared enough and taken time to give those coupons to me. I should not be throwing them away," said Tarruella.

So, instead, she used the newspaper clippings, receipts and coupons in her art. Tarruella placed the papers on a canvas, praying for everyone that made it possible for those things to reach her hands, she said.

Tarruella created her own paint to cover the collage. She "applied the Holy Spirit" to her work, she said, by gently placing tissue paper over the paint, which gave a "sense of peace" to the art.

Applied over the tissue paper, wax acts as a symbol of God's action in our lives, she said. "Like God's love, the wax is burning, but it is also tender."

"Hope" will be installed in gallery rooms with lights that can be turned on or off when visitors are viewing the art. Tarruella uses a bright fluorescent paint hidden beneath several layers.

When the lights are off, the concealed paint becomes visible, giving further meaning and dimension to the work.

"Even in the darkness, there is always light. God will guide you through the dark to where Jesus is," Tarruella said.

People around the world have responded positively to her art, she said, regardless of their religion or background.

"One time a lady saw my painting from the street and came into the gallery. She stood in front of the painting and looked at it. She suddenly began to cry because she was so moved by the painting. She had heard a voice calling her to open her heart," said Tarruella.

Vatican orders study of women religious in U.S.

The announcement was made Jan. 30 at the Basilica of the National Shrine of the Immaculate Conception in Washington by Sister Eva-Maria Ackerman, a member of the American province of the Sisters of St. Francis of the Martyr St. George.

She will assist Mother Mary Clare Millea, a Connecticut native who is superior general of the Apostles of the Sacred Heart of Jesus, an international religious institute that has its headquarters in Rome.

Cardinal Franc Rode, prefect of the Vatican's Congregation for Institutes of Consecrated Life and Societies of Apostolic Life, appointed Mother Clare as the apostolic visitor.

The cardinal sent letters detailing the task to both the Leadership Conference of Women Religious and the Council of Major Superiors of Women Religious, the two major organizations representing heads of women's religious orders in the United States.

It is too early to know how many volunteers will be enlisted to visit nearly 400 Catholic institutes for women religious in the United States, how much it will cost or who will pay for the study, Sister Ackerman said during the press conference at the national shrine.

"We hope to discover and share the vibrancy and purpose that continue to accomplish so much, as well as to understand the obstacles and challenges that inhibit these individuals and institutions, thus limiting their growth and/or redirecting their resources and outreach," she said.

The study — which is expected to be completed by 2011 — is in no way connected to the apostolic visitation of more than 200 U.S. seminaries and formation houses in 2005 and 2006, which was ordered in response to the sexual abuse crisis that hit the U.S. church, Sister Ackerman said.

It was not known why the Vatican chose to do this study now, why the United States was singled out and what prompted the Vatican congregation to order it, she said. "I don't even want to speculate," she added.

Once the study is concluded, a "comprehensive and confidential" report will be given to Cardinal Rode, but its findings are not expected to be made public, Sister Ackerman said.

"First, Mother Clare will solicit voluntary input from the superiors general through inviting them to make personal visits with her in Rome or in the United States," she said.

"During the second stage, the major superiors in the United States will be asked for information such as statistics, activities and community practices. Selected on-site visits will be made during the third stage," Sister Ackerman said.

Catholic women religious have been involved in education, health care and a variety of pastoral and social services in the United States since before the nation was founded in 1776, said Mother Clare in a prepared statement released at the press conference.

"I am truly humbled and a bit overwhelmed," she said of her assignment.

"While I have visited each of the communities and missions in my own congregation, the thought of gathering facts and findings about nearly 400 institutes across the United States can be daunting in scope," she said.

"I know that the object of this visitation is to encourage and strengthen apostolic communities of women religious, for the simple reason that these communities are integral to the entire life of the Catholic Church, in the United States and beyond," Mother Clare said.

Sister Ackerman acknowledged that the population of women religious has significantly dropped during the past several decades, and that fewer nuns have chosen to teach school in the past 30 years in favor of doing social outreach.

"Recruitment is of great concern for every (religious) community," she said.

"We live in a very different society," she added, than that experienced by many of the U.S. saints who were nuns — Sts. Elizabeth Ann Seton, Frances Xavier Cabrini, Katharine Drexel, Rose Philippine Duchesne and Mother Theodore Guerin.

Perspectives

A collection of columns, editorials and viewpoints

Spiritual, emotional and cultural

Faith is an integral part of holding onto our historical identity

Some time ago I found myself among about a dozen people, most of them my neighbors in New Mexico, at an organizational meeting of a Unitarian fellowship.

I went because the organizers are good friends and they insisted I join them. We sat in a circle in the assembly room of another church and each person in turn spoke about his past religious affiliations.

To my surprise, every person had left the church in which he or she had been born.

As I listened to them speak about their search for something new, I looked out a large window across the valley. There, on a gently sloping hillside, stood a chapel with adobe walls and a small bell tower jutting out of the rusty tin roof.

Named in honor of St. Isidore, patron of farmers, that chapel is where I often worshipped with my family when I was a child.

As I sat only half listening to the others, I remembered the lusty hymns, the hard wooden pews and the many processions, especially on Good Friday when the Penitentes, a penitential society of laymen, re-enacted the Crucifixion.

When my turn came to speak, I invited the others to look out across the valley to the chapel. I told them my grandfather and many other relatives, perhaps even my great-grandfather, are buried in the humble cemetery adjacent to the chapel.

I told them my experience in the Catholic Church has not always been good. Sometimes bishops, priests and fellow laypersons have disappointed me, as indeed I am sure I have sometimes failed to measure up in their standards.

But, as I emphasized to the group, we have a long history there. And I added: "I am not going to break with that history. The faith is part of who we are."

It's the same response I give to the Jehovah's Witnesses who come regularly to my door in New York, seeking to entice me to join their church. They find me by asking my neighbors, "Is there anyone who speaks Spanish here?"

I thought again about all this recently when I read about a talk President Barack Obama gave to American Jews in June 2008.

He said: "In many ways, I didn't know where I came from. So I was drawn to the belief that you could sustain a spiritual, emotional and cultural identity. And I understand the Zionist idea — that there is always a homeland at the center of our identity."

The homeland at the center of Hispanic identity, of course, is more than a place; it is a faith, a language, a tapestry of values embedded in a culture that places a high value on family and community and a history that stretches across the centuries all the way back to Spain.

There our ancestors battled the Moors for 700 years to preserve their faith and way of life.

For most if not all of us, necessity or opportunity has taken us away from the place where we were born. This is as true of immigrants as it is for my own people in New Mexico and other areas of the Southwest.

But wherever we have gone we have carried the portable aspects of our homeland with us. And the way to sustain the spiritual, emotional and cultural identity to which Obama alludes is not by giving all that up.

It is by knowing who we are, where we come from and what gifts we bring that we can best contribute to the multicultural society in which we now find ourselves.

Age-old questions

Love is ageless and expressed in many relationships — with others and with God

My local newspaper carried a picture of newlyweds, 95 years young, who were celebrating their marriage with a large, extended and multigenerational family. The bride wore white. The groom wore a dapper suit. Both wore big smiles.

Looking at that picture, some might wonder, "At their age?!"

I, however, marvel at their eagerness to unite themselves to each other in marriage in their twilight years, a commitment that many young people seem to shy away from today.

And I rejoice that their families were present to celebrate with them, giving their blessing and support as the couple embarks on a new chapter of life. Truly love knows no age or time limit.

This story reminded me of a study published in February 2007 that found that the risk for Alzheimer's-like dementia more than doubled in lonely people.

Lonely people were also more likely to be less economically and educationally accomplished, and tended to have more health problems than those who reported having strong social ties.

Loneliness, it seems, can take a horrible toll on us as we age. And yet, in today's busy world, many of us find less and less time to nurture strong relationships.

Time can pass without our calling a friend, visiting a shut-in relative or reaching out to a neighbor. We might take long-term relationships for granted, giving into pressure to spend time on newer, perhaps more exciting ones.

We might shun older people because we think we have nothing in common with them. We might ignore younger children for the same reason.

We might lose sight of the fact that, the Lord willing, we too will reach an older age.

True love, one that reflects our faith and value in the worth of other people, does not develop overnight. It cannot be forged in a few online chat sessions or a couple of dates.

Parent-child, husband-wife bonds cannot be improved upon by scheduling in brief "quality time" and ignoring long-term building.

And yet, more and more, that is what many aspects of society, with an emphasis on anti-aging, quick fixes and instant gratification, would lead us to believe. But we know otherwise, and we have examples from Scripture to guide us.

The greatest example of a long-term, loving relationship is the one we enjoy with our Creator. In Jeremiah 1:5, God says: "Before I formed you in the womb I knew you."

Yes, God knew us then and he knows us now — and he loves us completely!

Love through sacrifice shines in Christ's example of selfless giving, by his death on the cross and also through his whole life of service to those young, old, strong and infirm.

Living Well

MAUREEN PRATT
CNS COLUMNIST

If we look at love through the eyes of faith and expand our understanding of love beyond what television, radio and music outlets describe, we discover that love is ageless and can be expressed in many different relationships.

No one is too young or too old for God's all-encompassing love.

I think about those "kids," that couple who traveled 95 years and lived full lives before finding and marrying each other. What an example of the timeless expression of love!

Of course, not every loving relationship will end in marriage. But with examples like this one to inspire us, we too can look beyond society's often one-sided perception of love and help bring Christ's compassion and love to the world.

For with Christ, no one is ever alone.

Oversimplification leads to misunderstanding

Catholic media crucial for contextual reporting

The movie synopses printed in television program grids are models of conciseness. After giving the title, the year and the stars of the movie, the writer has minimal wordage left to describe the plot.

Some actual examples from recent TV logs:

"Ben Hur": "Friends become bitter enemies during the time of Christ."

"Julius Caesar": "Political intrigues lead to Caesar's downfall in old Rome."

"Pearl Harbor": "Friends join a war effort after the Japanese attack Hawaii."

"E.T.": "A California boy befriends a homesick alien."

History written in that style might find: "George Washington": "Affluent Virginia planter leads revolutionary army, named president, becomes father of his country."

Such condensed information is not inaccurate; it is just an oversimplification that provokes misunderstanding.

Another problem is instantaneous news. If you are too many beers into an evening and dance with a lampshade on your head while on vacation in Pago Pago, be prepared to see a photo of that when you come home.

Because of context and instantaneous news, the Vatican finds itself in a fix.

Not only the Vatican. So are Catholics who are called upon to be apologists at office coffee breaks, confronting such questions as "What's wrong with the church?" or "What is the pope up to?"

Not too long ago, the appointment of an auxiliary bishop of the Diocese of Linz, Austria, would have been little known outside the borders of that country.

And the contents of the parish newsletter in the Austrian town of Windischgarsten would have been of little concern other than among parishioners.

But it contained questionable opinions of the pastor, leading to a three-paragraph story with this headline: "Pope Promotes New Orleans Critic."

In 2005, Father Gerhard Wagner was quoted in the parish newsletter as saying he was convinced that the death and destruction caused by Hurricane Katrina that year was "divine retribution" upon New Orleans for its permissive sexual attitudes and tolerance of homosexuality.

The brevity in reporting gives good reason for a reader to have the impression that being named a bishop was reward for his unorthodox statements.

In another case, the Society of St. Pius X situation extends back through two papacies and decades with canon lawyers wrestling with the question.

Bishop Richard Williamson, one of four bishops whose illicit ordination in 1988 by French Archbishop Marcel Lefebvre prompted their automatic excommunication, provoked protests worldwide with his assertions that the Holocaust was exaggerated and that no Jews died in Nazi gas chambers.

Consider This

STEPHEN KENT
CNS COLUMNIST

Denying the Holocaust, like denying your own right hand, is clearly stupid but not a cause for excommunication.

Likewise, making poor remarks years ago is no reason for a perpetual ban on a person.

A Vatican statement said Pope Benedict XVI did not know about Bishop Williamson's controversial statements when he lifted the excommunication of him and three other traditionalist bishops.

These two events show the result of the quest for brevity and instant communication at the expense of context.

When, weeks later, the Vatican said the pope was unaware of Bishop Williamson's remarks, brevity led to an incomplete understanding of infallibility.

Thus another coffee-break topic.

"How could it be he does not know? He is infallible."

Because of the shorthand of brevity of context, full understanding needs more than "Pope Reinstates Denier of Holocaust" or "Pope Promotes New Orleans Critic."

This is Catholic Press Month. There is no better evidence to illustrate the value of the Catholic media — print, video and Internet — than this need for contextual reporting.

Controlling passions harnesses energy for doing good, pope says

The Pope Speaks

POPE
BENEDICT XVI

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — When people control their passions and desires, they can direct their energy toward total love of God and serving others, Pope Benedict XVI said.

"Passions are not bad in themselves" but can lead to bad behavior if they are not controlled, the pope said Feb. 11 during his weekly general audience.

The pope's talk focused on St. John Climacus, the sixth-century author of "Scala Paradisi" ("Ladder of Paradise"), a step-by-step explanation of how to grow and mature in the spiritual life.

The audience talk marked a return to the pope's audience series on the great Christian writers of early Christianity.

Pope Benedict said St. John Climacus' work divides the Christian spiritual journey into three phases: cultivating "spiritual infancy," or the attitude of a child totally dependent on God; "spiritual combat" against human passions through the cultivation of spiritual virtues; and obtaining "Christian perfection" through faith, hope and love.

For St. John Climacus, he said, spiritual combat is not a negative exercise in the sense of ridding one's life of desires, but rather takes the positive approach of cultivating virtues so that passion becomes a source of energy and of true longing for union with God.

"According to St. John, passions are not bad in themselves. They only become so because of the negative way people with their freedom use them. If they are purified, passions set people energetically on the path toward God," the pope said.

The pope said in reading the work of St. John, "For me it is particularly important that the highest point of the ladder, the top rungs, are at the same time the basic, initial, most simple virtues: faith, hope and love. They aren't virtues that are accessible only to moral heroes. They are virtues that are gifts of God and in which our life grows."

Faith obviously comes first because it is through faith that people renounce their arrogance and self-centeredness, recognizing that God is the creator and ruler of all, he said.

"St. John Climacus rightly says that only hope makes us able to love. Hope helps us transcend the things of daily life and not expect success from one day to the next," he said.

With hope "we can support the delusions of each day, we can be good to others without reward," the pope said, and with hope we take small steps forward each day "and in that way we learn love. Let us climb this ladder of faith, hope and love, and in that way we will arrive at true life."

Going green with NFP

Natural family planning respects nature of marital act, encouraged for Catholics

In his 2008 World Day of Peace message, Pope Benedict XVI called for a "strengthening" of the "covenant between human beings and the environment" and has since been widely dubbed the "green pope."

I invite Catholic couples to follow the pope's message and go green this year by taking a natural family planning class.

Natural family planning (NFP) is "about going green," according to Christopher Thompson, associate professor in Catholic studies and theology at the University of St. Thomas in Minnesota.

"People want their food, they want their vegetables, they want their meat to be raised with some sort of respect for the nature of the thing," he said.

Thompson said he he questions why some couples lower their standards when it comes to their marriages.

"Why introduce into your body chemicals you wouldn't put in your garden? Why use plastics or petroleum products in the bedroom if you won't use them anywhere else?" he asked.

Our society is beginning to favor the wisdom of nature. We buy organic products and insist on breastfeeding as the best form of nutrition for our infants.

As such, why not make the effort to learn NFP?

Natural family planning is an umbrella term for the various methods used to achieve and avoid pregnancies.

These methods are based on observation of naturally occurring signs of the fertile and infertile phases of a woman's menstrual cycle.

No drugs, devices, or surgical procedures are used. Couples abstain from intercourse during times identified as fertile if pregnancy is to be avoided.

And when used correctly, research shows that NFP methods are 97-99 percent effective.

While children are the greatest gift in a marriage, couples may at times need to postpone pregnancy

After the fire's fury

Australian archbishop pledges church's support to wildfire victims

CANBERRA, Australia (CNS) — The head of the Australian Catholic Bishops' Conference said the Catholic Church would lend both spiritual and practical support to families victimized by a series of wildfires that left more than 180 dead in Victoria state.

"I know that Catholic parishes across Australia have been praying for the people who died in the bush fires, as well as for those experiencing the grief of losing loved ones, family homes and cherished pets and belongings," said Archbishop Philip Wilson of Adelaide, conference president, in a Feb. 9 statement.

"Catholic relief agencies, such as St. Vincent de Paul and Centacare, are already at work providing much-needed assistance to people on the ground in these communities. This support will continue over the coming months and years, as we walk with these families and communities in their time of need," Archbishop Wilson said in a Feb. 9 statement.

"My prayers and thoughts are with all who are suffering so grievously," Archbishop Wilson said.

In a separate statement, Good Samaritan Sister Clare Condon, president of Catholic Religious Australia, the nation's organization for men and women religious, said, "With all Australians, we will work to provide the practical support and help that is needed."

At the Vatican, Cardinal Tarcisio Bertone, secretary of state, sent a telegram to Quentin Bryce, governor general of Australia, assuring her of Pope Benedict XVI's prayers for those affected by the fires as well as for those providing aid.

Denis Fitzgerald, executive director of Catholic Social Services Victoria, said in a statement that the emergency relief arm of the St. Vincent de Paul Society was "providing immediate assistance and assessing needs for recovery" on a parish-by-parish basis.

Centacare agencies in four Australian dioceses were providing assistance as well. Centacare is the national federation of Catholic social service agencies.

"Their professional expertise in counseling is very important and will become more so over the coming weeks and months, as the recovery phase takes off," Fitzgerald said.

Archbishop Wilson urged people to give generously to emergency appeals being established to assist those affected by the fires. Archbishop Denis Hart of Melbourne, the capital of Victoria, established one appeal; the St. Vincent de Paul Society set up another.

Australian Prime Minister Kevin Rudd announced immediate emergency aid of $10 million (US$6.8 million), and government officials said the army would be deployed to help fight the fires and clean up the debris.

The Country Fire Authority in Victoria said some 850 square miles were burned. Some towns were fully lost to the flames. Australian authorities said they expected the death toll to top 200.

The Associated Press reported blazes had been burning for weeks across several states in southern Australia. A long-running drought — the worst in a century — had left forests extra dry, and fire conditions Feb. 7 in Victoria were said to be the worst ever in Australia.

Wildfires are common during the Australian summer. Government research shows about half of the roughly 60,000 fires each year are deliberately lit or suspicious. Lightning and people using machinery near dry brush are other causes. Police were investigating whether any of the Victoria fires had suspicious origins.

Australia's previous worst fires were in 1983, when blazes killed 75 people and razed more than 3,000 homes in the states of Victoria and South Australia during the "Ash Wednesday fires." Seventy-one died and 650 buildings were destroyed in 1939's "Black Friday fires."

FRONT-LINE FATHER

Priest-reservist serves troops as chaplain in Afghanistan

COLUMBUS, Ohio (CNS) — Just a few months ago, Father Joseph Porpiglia was running a parish in the Diocese of Buffalo, N.Y., but he currently is in Afghanistan serving as a Navy chaplain.

The priest, who holds the rank of lieutenant commander, finds himself traveling via helicopter across a rugged countryside that was once ruled — and is still contested — by the Taliban regime.

"I don't like focusing on me," Father Porpiglia stated in a recent e-mail to a reporter based in Columbus. "I like to focus on what our men and women are doing and the great job they are doing."

He had expected to be returning home in March but his tour has been extended until after Easter.

It is the priest's second tour of duty in the region. In 2003, he served in Iraq with Surgical Company A of the 4th Medical Battalion. In Afghanistan, he celebrates Mass and ministers to soldiers at a number of forward operating bases in southern and eastern areas of the country.

Some of these bases are small outposts with no running water or a kitchen, while others are huge complexes, complete with gyms and a Pizza Hut. Some of them, he stated, take days to get to.

Father Porpiglia, pastor of St. Benedict Church in Amherst, N.Y., has been a reservist with the U.S. Coast Guard for 17 years. He was called up for active duty last summer when the U.S. military designated him an "individual augmentee," someone assigned to a unit for the purpose of filling in for, or augmenting, members of that unit.

Individual augmentees are assigned individually rather than as part of a brigade, battalion or company and often are used to fill a shortage or because they have special knowledge or skills. As in Father Porpiglia's case, they can be assigned to a branch of the military other than the one they serve regularly.

Father Porpiglia has embraced his duties. He said he cherishes the opportunity to be an avenue of support for young service members.

"My time over here has been good," he wrote in his e-mail. "There are many challenges along the way, but growing experiences as well. ... Did I tell you the flak jacket with (body armor) plates weighs 70 pounds?"

Father Porpiglia is one of about 300 Catholic priests who are currently military chaplains.

A priest must get the permission of his bishop to serve in the military. As chaplains in the armed forces, priests are under the jurisdiction of the U.S. Archdiocese for the Military Services, based in Washington and headed by Archbishop Timothy P. Broglio.

The archdiocese is in charge of the spiritual, pastoral and sacramental care of the 375,000 Catholic active-duty U.S. military personnel and their 800,000 family members; 200,000 Catholics in the Reserves and National Guard; 30,000 Catholic patients in 172 Veterans Affairs hospitals; and 66,000 Catholics in government service overseas in 134 countries.

According to the archdiocese, there are 12 Catholic chaplains currently in Iraq and one or two in Afghanistan.

More than 25 percent of people in the military are Catholic, yet only 7 percent of the chaplains are Catholic priests.

A spokesman for the Diocese of Buffalo said officials had no misgivings in letting Father Porpiglia fulfill his military duty. He also said they did not have any problems temporarily filling the priest's post at St. Benedict Church.

Catholic leaders express worries over Chavez victory

BOGOTA, Colombia (CNS) — Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez's victory in a Feb. 15 referendum that eliminated term limits worries some Catholic leaders, who see it as a blow to the nation's democracy.

Chavez already has been president for a decade, and by the next presidential election in 2012 he may have accumulated so much power that he will be very hard to unseat, said Auxiliary Bishop Jesus Gonzalez de Zarate Salas of Caracas, Venezuela. "He who is in power has the opportunity to wield a great influence over the electorate," Bishop Gonzalez said.

Before the referendum campaign, the government used government ministries and state-owned industries to push for the constitutional amendment, which passed with 54 percent of the vote.

"The government abused the resources at its disposition," said Jesuit Father Arturo Peraza, who works in a Caracas prison ministry.

Nevertheless, both Bishop Gonzalez and Father Peraza acknowledged the president's support and work with the government to move the country forward.

The Catholic Church, which has warned about an undue concentration of power in Chavez's hands as well as violations of human rights, soaring crime rates and social problems, had opposed the constitutional change. Immediately after the voting results were announced, Chavez declared he would run again in 2012.

Chavez, who says he is leading Venezuela in a socialist revolution, is an open admirer and ally of communist Cuba, where some religious rights are restricted.

Bishop Gonzalez said he does not expect to see such restrictions in Venezuela, but noted that education reform legislation could remove autonomy from Catholic schools, and free speech has been compromised by the government's practice of attacking those who disagree with administration policies. Chavez has accused them of behaving more like politicians than religious leaders.

FROM THE VATICAN

Date set for final approval of Blessed Damien's canonization

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — The Vatican announced that final approval would be given Feb. 21 for the canonization of Blessed Damien de Veuster, a Belgian-born missionary priest who served patients with Hansen's disease on the Hawaiian island of Molokai more than a century ago.

Pope Benedict XVI authorized the publication of a decree recognizing a miracle attributed to the intercession of Blessed Damien last July, clearing the way for his canonization.

The Vatican said Feb. 16 that an "ordinary public consistory"—a meeting of the pope with cardinals resident in Rome and invited bishops and other dignitaries—would be held Feb. 21 to finalize the approval of 10 canonizations, including Blessed Damien's.

The dates for the canonization ceremonies are expected to be announced shortly after the consistory.

Blessed Damien was a 19th-century missionary, a member of the Congregation of the Sacred Hearts of Jesus and Mary. Born in 1840, he spent the last 16 years of his life caring for patients with Hansen's disease, or leprosy, on Molokai.

Blessed Damien died in 1889 and was beatified in 1995.

The miracle attributed to Blessed Damien involves the 1999 healing of Audrey Horner Toguchi, a Hawaiian who had been diagnosed with cancer. She had a tumor and other tissue removed and underwent radiation; when new tumors were found on her lungs, she decided to pray to Blessed Damien instead of undergoing the chemotherapy her doctors recommended.

The lung tumors gradually shrunk and disappeared altogether.

In his message for World Leprosy Day 2009, Mexican Cardinal Javier Lozano Barragan called Blessed Damien "a lighthouse of faith and love."

Economic interests drive wider acceptance of eugenics, says archbishop

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Big economic interests and subtle changes in terminology are helping spread a wider acceptance of eugenics, said Archbishop Rino Fisichella, president of the Pontifical Academy for Life.

"The term 'eugenics' seems something of the past and just mentioning the word elicits horror," he said during a Vatican press conference Feb. 17.

But as often happens, "subtle linguistic formalism together with good advertising that is supported by big economic interests causes one to lose sight of the real dangers" underlying the many advancements in genetics, he said.

A lack of clarity also can prevent people from being able "to recognize actual objective evil and formulate a corresponding ethical judgment," he added.

The archbishop was presenting details of a Feb. 20-21 international congress sponsored by the academy for life that will look at "The New Frontiers of Genetics and the Risk of Eugenics."

The eugenics movement, which focuses on improving the human species by controlling hereditary factors in mating, was associated with Nazi attempts to purify the German race.

Genetic research and technology should continue and be supported in order to help heal or ease the suffering of individuals, Archbishop Fisichella said.

But, he said, scientific progress must be accompanied by greater ethical awareness that respects the full dignity of every human person.

The introduction to the congress program said excesses in the field of genetics can "lead to so-called eugenics which, in its various forms, seeks to obtain the perfect human being," which includes unethical means that violate respect of all forms and conditions of human life.

A real risk exists that genetics may drift away from being used solely for the good of humanity, Archbishop Fisichella said, and the abuse of genetic information is unfortunately part of "a mentality that is starting to slowly, yet inexorably, spread."

Ethical guidelines and judgments are needed to make sure the quest to help people live a so-called normal life does not result in eugenic acts, he said.

For the love of literacy

Catholic recognized by state for volunteer service

BY KATIE MOORE
STAFF WRITER

NORTH WILKESBORO — A parishioner of St. John the Baptista de la Salle Church in North Wilkesboro was recognized recently for her work with a Wilkes County literacy program for adults.

Helen Latour was one of 20 people in North Carolina to receive the Medallion Award for Outstanding Volunteer Service and the first ever from Wilkes County to receive the honor.

Implemented in 2006 by the North Carolina Commission on Volunteerism and Community Service, the Medallion Award recognizes the top volunteers in the state.

Latour founded Volunteers for Wilkes Literacy in 1989 because she was shocked by the number of adults in the area who could not read beyond a third-grade level.

As a teacher, starting a literacy program was a natural fit.

"There was no use complaining," said Latour, who decided to "get down and do something about it."

For the next 17 years she served as director of the program, which provides one-on-one tutoring for illiterate adults as well as after-school tutoring for elementary school students and a children's summer enrichment program.

According to Latour, approximately 20 out of every 100 people in western North Carolina cannot read.

But the problem is not limited to the region.

"For me, it was a call."

— Helen Latour

"This is not a feature of the south or the backwoods; there are big cities where people cannot read," she said.

"The ability to read is so critical," said Latour, who encourages anyone who feels called to volunteer as a tutor to contact his or her local literacy association.

"I think it's a call," she said. "For me it was a call."

When she started the program, Latour had one thing in mind.

"My goal was to help the individual," she said. "To see the sparkle in a student's eyes when they got a sentence all by themselves, that was the best thing."

Sisters of Mercy and Park Ridge Hospital collaborate to provide urgent care

ARDEN — The Sisters of Mercy are expanding their urgent care network.

The new Sisters of Mercy Urgent Care facility will open in Arden April 1. Tim Johnston, president and CEO of Sisters of Mercy Services Corporation, and Jim Bunch, president and CEO of Park Ridge Hospital, made the announcement in a Feb. 12 press release.

The facility, currently operated by Park Ridge Hospital, offers patients convenience and access to quality treatment of minor illness and injuries.

It also will join the Sister of Mercy's existing urgent care network, which includes two facilities in Asheville and one in Weaverville.

"The collaboration of Park Ridge Hospital with Sisters of Mercy Urgent Care is a natural fit as these two faith-based organizations continue to meet the healthcare needs of western North Carolina while focusing on their respective strengths," said Paul Tax, executive director of operations for Sisters of Mercy Urgent Care.

"We all need to focus on our core strengths to provide the highest quality service," said Bunch. "This is what our friends at Sisters of Mercy do best."

The Sisters of Mercy have owned and operated urgent care centers successfully in Buncombe County for nearly 30 years, and served western North Carolina's health care and service needs since 1900.

In addition to Sisters of Mercy Urgent Care, Sisters of Mercy Services Corporation includes ARP/Phoenix Behavioral Health and Substance Abuse Services, Mountain Health Contracting general contractors, and the Catherine McAuley MERCY Foundation.

Park Ridge Hospital is an acute care facility that has provided medical care with Christian compassion since 1910. The hospital is one of 37 hospitals in the United States belonging to Adventist Health System.

who have been away from the faith and are interested in coming back to the Catholic Church.

"It's just a way of giving the folks a little nudge to try and get them back into church," said Hitch.

It began three years ago at the church as a project of the parish Evangelization Commission.

"One of the missions of our commission is to provide programs to invite back our brothers and sisters who have not been active in the church," said Larry Kwan, chairman.

Kwan compared HOSEA to a road map for Catholics who are trying to make their way back to the church.

One of the goals of HOSEA is to provide a safe and comfortable atmosphere where people's questions can be answered.

"So many of us in the church don't know why we do the things that we do," said Joyce Korabek, a parishioner who was instrumental in implementing the HOSEA program.

sessions that are offered twice a year.

At each of the sessions, a speaker presents a topic and a priest or deacon from the parish is available to answer questions.

Each session also provides opportunities for participants to express their concerns, problems or misunderstandings.

"I think a lot of us were hard on ourselves for whatever reason," said Korabek, who was once a returning Catholic.

The Lyons family is pictured with Oblate of St. Francis de Sales Father John Kelly at Immaculate Heart of Mary Church following the baptism of their children Oct. 15, 2006. Scott Lyons is a former participant of the HOSEA program. Also pictured is his wife, Laura, a convert to Catholicism, and their children (from left) Avery, Sophia, William and Anna.

"Some people are slow to discuss because they just want to take it in for a while," she said.

"One of the things I found most helpful was just getting to know people in the church," said Scott Lyons, a past participant.

"Sometimes it is hard to get to know people in a parish when you are new," he said.

The HOSEA groups are typically small, consisting of about three or four people.

"It was a little different than what I expected," said Lyons, who was surprised by the varying backgrounds of his fellow participants.

"I had already decided to come back to the Catholic Church. That was a decision I had already made," he said. "I just wanted to find out as much as possible."

As a baptized Catholic, Lyons began attending an evangelical church with his family when he was 10 years old.

"I came from a very solid faith background even though it wasn't Catholic," he said. "My expectation was to find more people like me."

He was surprised to learn of the different circumstances that had brought the others to the group.

"I had not been a practicing Catholic for quite a number of years," said Ed Scannell, another former participant.

Having recently moved to the area, Scannell started attending Mass at Immaculate Heart of Mary Church at the encouragement of his wife.

He saw an announcement in the bulletin for the HOSEA program and decided it was something he wanted to try.

"The people who spoke to us every week were not judgmental about why any of us had not practiced our faith for so long," Scannell said.

"They wanted to show that the church was welcoming and that there had been a shift in thinking in the church that had occurred since many of us had been practicing Catholics as young people," he said.

That shift, was not to be confused with a shift in morals, he said, but rather a new attitude—one that was "welcoming and non-judgmental."

Scannell's wife, who was not Catholic at the time, attended the HOSEA sessions with him to offer support.

"It gave her a very close-up and interesting perspective on the church that ended up making her want to convert," Scannell said of his wife, Terri, who was baptized during the Easter Vigil last year.

Lyons had a similar experience in that his wife, Laura, also converted to Catholicism. Since then, the Lyons have had all of their children baptized, with the exception of their newborn daughter, who will be baptized at the end of February.

"It's a marvelous program," said Oblate of St. Francis de Sales Father John Kelly, pastor of Immaculate Heart of Mary Church, who re-emphasized the fact that coming back to the faith really is as simple as putting one foot in front of the other.

As a Catholic, "you have a right to the sacraments and to the life of the parish community," Father Kelly said. "There is no test for you to pass so that you can be worthy of the sacraments."

"We are happy with the success we've had," said Kwan, adding that he hopes the program can be a model for other churches.

The current HOSEA session began Feb. 11 and runs through March 18.

Catholic legislators must protect life, pope tells House speaker

BY CINDY WODDEN
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

VATICAN CITY — Pope Benedict XVI met privately with U.S. Rep. Nancy Pelosi, speaker of the House of Representatives, and told her that all Catholics, especially those who are lawmakers, must work to protect human life at every stage.

Pelosi, a Catholic Democrat from California, has been criticized by many Catholics for her support for keeping abortion legal.

"His Holiness took the opportunity to speak of the requirements of the natural moral law and the church's consistent teaching on the dignity of human life from conception to natural death," the Vatican said in a statement about the Feb. 18 meeting.

Natural law and the church's own teaching require "all Catholics, and especially legislators, jurists and those responsible for the common good of society, to work in cooperation with all men and women of good will in creating a just system of laws capable of protecting human life at all stages of its development," the statement said.

Pelosi was making an official visit to Italy to meet members of the U.S. military stationed in the country and to discuss common security concerns with Italian government leaders.

Her 15-minute meeting with Pope Benedict took place in a small room in the Vatican audience hall after the pope's weekly general audience.

In a statement released by her staff, Pelosi said, "In our conversation, I had the opportunity to praise the church's leadership in fighting poverty, hunger and global warming, as well as the Holy Father's dedication to religious freedom and his upcoming trip and message to Israel."

The papal trip is scheduled for the second week of May.

"Being sheep in the midst of wolves doesn't mean we can also be dumb as rocks."

— Archbishop Charles J. Chaput

Pelosi also said, "I was proud to show His Holiness a photograph" from a papal audience she had with her parents in the 1950s, "as well as a recent picture of our children and grandchildren."

Pelosi's husband, Paul, accompanied her to the meeting with the pope.

Abortion and Communion

The speaker has made no secret of her belief that while efforts are needed to reduce the number of abortions in the United States and to help women faced with problem pregnancies, she believes abortion must remain safe and legal.

Coinciding with the 2009 March for Life in Washington, Pelosi issued a statement Jan. 22 saying, "I will work with President Obama, as I have worked throughout my entire career, to ensure a woman's right to choose."

"Decisions about whether to have a child do not and should not rest with the government. We believe a woman — in consultation with her family, her physician and her faith — is best qualified to make that decision," Pelosi said.

As a publicly practicing Catholic and a public opponent of efforts to make abortion illegal, Pelosi has come under sharp criticism by some bishops and other Catholics who believe that a politician who supports legalized abortion should not be allowed to receive Communion.

Other bishops, including Pelosi's own Archbishop George H. Niederauer of San Francisco, have recognized the public service of such politicians and have opted to engage them in a dialogue on promoting respect for human life in a wide range of public policies.

But Pelosi angered many bishops and other Catholics in August when she told the television program "Meet the Press" that church leaders for centuries had not been able to agree on when life begins.

She told interviewer Tom Brokaw, "We don't know" when life begins.

"I don't think anybody can tell you when life begins, human life begins. As I say, the Catholic Church for centuries has been discussing this," she said.

The chairmen of the U.S. bishops' pro-life and doctrine committees criticized Pelosi, saying she "misrepresented the history and nature of the authentic teaching of the Catholic Church on abortion" in the interview.

Cardinal Justin Rigali of Philadelphia and Bishop William E. Lori of Bridgeport, Conn., said the church since the first century "has affirmed the moral evil of every abortion."

"The teaching has not changed and remains unchangeable," their statement said. "Direct abortion, that is to say, abortion willed either as an end or a means, is gravely contrary to the moral law."

In an April 2008 teleconference with Catholic News Service and other media representatives, Pelosi said, "I have a sort of serenity" about receiving Communion even though her position on abortion differs from the church's.

"The church sees it another way, and I respect that," she said, adding, however, that she hoped the U.S. bishops would not use the refusal of holy Communion as a way of punishing Catholic politicians who don't heed church teachings on abortion.

"Think of that word Communion, that which brings us all together as Christians, as Catholics," Pelosi said.

Denying a Catholic the Eucharist "would be something that would shatter that union," she said.

RESPECT LIFE

'40 Days for Life'

National pro-life campaign to be held in locations around Diocese of Charlotte

BY MARY B. WORTHINGTON
CORRESPONDENT

MOCKSVILLE — During Lent, Catholics in three communities within the Diocese of Charlotte will be participating in a nationwide ecumenical pro-life campaign.

Called "40 Days for Life," the campaign aims to end abortion through prayer, fasting, vigils and public outreach.

The first campaign took place in 2004 in College Station, Texas. In 2007 the effort went nationwide, with campaigns in 89 cities in 33 states. This year, campaigns in Charlotte, Winston-Salem and Franklin will be part of the 118 campaigns at abortion clinics in more than 40 states plus locations in Canada and Australia.

The campaign runs from Ash Wednesday, Feb. 25, through Palm Sunday, April 5.

Through prayer vigils at abortion clinics such as Planned Parenthood, the campaign's purpose is to "touch hearts and minds, save lives and show that extreme pro-abortion policies do not resonate with the values of this nation," said Shawn Carney, national campaign director.

The campaign's original goal was to have 40 churches or groups sign up for one day each, to pray 24 hours a day, seven days a week outside a local abortion clinic for a total of 40 days.

Due to safety and logistics, organizers in the Diocese of Charlotte have scaled back on the hours.

In Charlotte, 10 parishes have signed up so far; in Winston-Salem, five parishes are registered.

Students from Charlotte Catholic High School and Bishop McGuinness High School in Kernersville plan to participate in the Charlotte and Winston-Salem campaigns, respectively, along with groups of homeschooled students and others.

Though abortion is commonly seen as a "women's issue," both women and men are encouraged to participate.

"Men have to be involved in pro-life activities since so often in our society we are the ones who are creating an atmosphere of acceptance for abortion," said Brian Williams, a parishioner of St. Ann Church in Charlotte.

The campaign results include not only lives saved from abortion, but also healing for women who have suffered because of abortions.

"[During the last campaign], one post-abortive woman stopped to talk and we were able to pray with her and give her Rachel's Vineyard information," said Toni Buckler, a parishioner of Holy Family Church in Clemmons.

Rachel's Vineyard is a ministry to women who have had abortions.

Buckler also explained the impact of community education during the campaigns. "We were able to hold civil conversations with people who challenged us regarding keeping abortion legal for rape victims, mother's health, etc.," she said.

Other activities planned include door-to-door outreach and letter writing campaigns to raise community awareness.

Catholics encouraged to support specialty plate bill of a bill that would make available in North Carolina the plate with the words "Choose Life" and the faces of two children on it.

Funds raised through the sale of the plates would be distributed by the N.C. Department of Health and Human Services to nonprofit crisis pregnancy centers that do not offer abortion-related services, referrals or counseling.

The rally was co-sponsored by North Carolina Right to Life and North Carolina Pro-Life Democrats. Twenty-two states have approved the plate; North Carolina is the only Southern state that has not allowed the plate and not allowed a vote on it by full assembly. Currently North Carolina issues 122 specialty license plates that promote issues from environmental causes to colleges.

Among the rally speakers was Msgr. Michael Clay, legislative liaison and lobbyist for Charlotte Bishop Peter J. Jugis of Charlotte and Raleigh Bishop Michael F. Burbidge, who read a statement from both bishops during the news conference.

In their statement, the bishops said they speak "on behalf of hundreds of thousands of Catholics throughout the state of North Carolina who support our request that this bill be allowed a vote by the full legislature and endorse its passage."

With limited financial resources available to the crisis pregnancy centers, the bishops' statement said, "these centers would benefit from the revenue they would receive, at no cost to the state, to assist women in their time of need."

"Surely no one would oppose assisting a needy pregnant woman who desires to bring her child to birth through funds raised from the sale of a license plate," the bishops said.

Other speakers included two young women who had received assistance from such centers during childbirth.

Maggi Nadol, Respect Life coordinator for the Diocese of Charlotte, said the plates would allow more freedom of expression by pro-life Christians. "Anything that we can do to promote the sanctity of life as an issue is important both to the unborn and for the advancement of our Christian mission."

The bishops' statement appealed to "Christians, especially the Catholics in our state, and all people of good will to contact their legislators and ask them to support this legislation and to allow it to be voted on by the full legislature."

Contributing to this story were David Hains and Frank Morock.

Pope says Holocaust denial is 'intolerable ... unacceptable'

Jewish leaders meet with pope at Vatican

BY CINDY WOODEN
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

VATICAN CITY — Denying or minimizing the Holocaust "is intolerable and altogether unacceptable," Pope Benedict XVI told a group of U.S. Jewish leaders.

"This terrible chapter in our history must never be forgotten," the pope said during a Feb. 12 meeting at the Vatican with members of the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations.

The papal audience came less than three weeks after the Vatican announced the pope had lifted the excommunication of several traditionalist bishops, including Bishop Richard Williamson, who has said reports about the Nazi slaughter of the Jews have been exaggerated and who claimed no Jews died in Nazi gas chambers.

The Vatican later published a statement saying that Bishop Williamson would not be welcomed into full communion with the church unless he disavowed his remarks and publicly apologized.

While the pope publicly reaffirmed his recognition of the Holocaust and expressed his respect and esteem for the Jewish people in late January, the February audience was the first time since the Bishop Williamson scandal that the pope met with Jewish leaders to express his feelings and beliefs personally.

Telling the Jewish leaders he wanted to make his own a prayer by Pope John Paul II, Pope Benedict prayed, "God of our fathers, you chose Abraham and his descendants to bring your name to the nations:

"We are deeply saddened by the behavior of those who in the course of history have caused these children of yours to suffer and, asking your forgiveness, we wish to commit ourselves to genuine brotherhood with the people of the Covenant."

The prayer was the text of the note Pope John Paul left in Jerusalem's Western Wall, one of Judaism's holiest sites, during a March 2000 visit.

Pope Benedict also told the Jewish leaders about his own visit to the Nazis' Auschwitz death camp in 2006.

"As I walked through the entrance to that place of horror, the scene of such untold suffering, I meditated on the countless number of prisoners, so many of them Jews, who had trodden that same path into captivity at Auschwitz and in all the other prison camps," the pope said.

"How can we begin to grasp the enormity of what took place in those infamous prisons?" he asked.

The pope told the leaders, "The hatred and contempt for men, women and children that was manifested in the Shoah was a crime against God and against humanity.

"This should be clear to everyone," the pope said.

"It is beyond question that any denial ... of this terrible crime is intolerable and altogether unacceptable."

— Pope Benedict XVI

"It is beyond question that any denial or minimization of this terrible crime is intolerable and altogether unacceptable," Pope Benedict said.

The German-born pope repeated what he had said during his visit to Auschwitz:

"The rulers of the Third Reich wanted to crush the entire Jewish people, to cancel it from the register of the peoples of the earth. Thus the words of the psalm, 'We are being killed, accounted as sheep for the slaughter,' were fulfilled in a terrifying way."

The pope also told the Jewish leaders that the Catholic Church "is profoundly and irrevocably committed to reject all anti-Semitism" and to build good and lasting relations with the Jewish community.

Reaffirming the importance of remembering the Holocaust, the pope said, "it is my fervent prayer that the memory of this appalling crime will strengthen our determination to heal the wounds that for too long have sullied relations between Christians and Jews."

'A historic day'

Rabbi Arthur Schneier of New York's Park East Synagogue, which Pope Benedict visited last April, told the group it was "a trying moment in Catholic-Jewish relations" because Bishop Williamson's excommunication was lifted.

The 78-year-old Austrian-born rabbi told the pope, "As a Holocaust survivor these have been painful and difficult days when confronted with Holocaust denial by no less than a bishop."

"The Shoah claimed the lives of 6 million Jewish men, women and children, including my own family in Auschwitz and Terezin," a camp in what is now the Czech Republic, he told the pope.

Addressing the 81-year-old pope, he said, "Your Holiness, we and so many others, who have seen man's inhumanity to man, how can we but revolt at Holocaust denial?"

"In our autumn years," he told the pope, "we must transmit 'never again' through Holocaust education to future generations."

Meeting reporters after the papal audience, Rabbi Schneier said, "This is a historic day," adding that it was "so reassuring to hear the pope say what he had to say about the Shoah."

Malcolm Hoenlein, executive vice chairman of the U.S. Jewish leaders' group, said, "We came here with heavy hearts" because of the lifting of the excommunication of Bishop Williamson.

But the leaders were pleased by the pope's reaffirmation of the principles of the Second Vatican Council regarding relations with the Jews and his condemnation of anti-Semitism and of Holocaust denial "in the strongest possible words," Hoenlein said.

But Abraham Foxman, U.S. director of the Anti-Defamation League, said "it is always significant when the pope meets with a Jewish group and his words were very important, but it did not bring closure."

While Foxman said he believes in forgiveness, he also believes that Bishop Williamson should not be considered a Catholic until he recants.

"Every moment that he stays in the church, it gives credibility to him and to his hideous beliefs," he said.

Rabbi David Rosen, director of interreligious affairs for the American Jewish Committee, said the meeting was important for assuring the Jewish community that the Catholic Church and the pope personally are committed to upholding the teaching of the Second Vatican Council and its positive attitude toward the Jewish people and their faith.

"It was a very strong and, I would say, quite moving affirmation of his commitment to Catholic-Jewish reconciliation and opposition to Holocaust denial and any other form of anti-Semitism," he said.

The rabbi also said he believed the uproar surrounding Bishop Williamson could have the positive effect of ensuring uniform acceptance of Vatican II.

He expressed hope that the traditionalist Society of St. Pius X, to which Bishop Williamson belongs, would not be fully reintegrated into the Catholic Church without a serious investigation into the society's teaching on Jews and Judaism and its acceptance of the teachings of Vatican II, which it has opposed.

Vatican City plays big role in promoting world peace army, seems "apparently irrelevant within the big, international geopolitical strategies," he said.

But precisely because the Holy See is truly free and independent from the world's geopolitical powers it can continually promote solidarity and the common good, he said.

Perhaps it is for that reason that "everyone from every part of the world pays attention to this tiny strip of land," he added.

Vatican City State was established Feb. 11, 1929, when Vatican officials and Italy's Prime Minister Benito Mussolini signed the Lateran Pacts in which the Vatican and the Italian state recognized each other as sovereign nations.

The Vatican organized a Feb. 12-14 congress titled "A Small Territory for a Big Mission," to mark the city-state's 80th anniversary.

The pope told congress participants the Vatican wanted to establish sovereignty so that it could carry out its spiritual mission in the world unimpeded by "the often turbulent events in the sea of history."

The pope thanked all Vatican employees for working at the service of the church with professional skill and honesty.

He prayed Vatican City always would be "a true 'city upon a hill,' radiant for its beliefs and the generous dedication of all those who work in the service of the ecclesial mission of the successor of Peter."

Celebrating a spiritual state

Marking its 80th, Vatican celebrates its growth into nationhood

BY CAROL GLATZ
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

VATICAN CITY — The smallest nation in the world is celebrating a relatively young 80th birthday this year.

Although the Catholic Church has a 2,000-year history, Vatican City State was established Feb. 11, 1929, to guarantee that the Holy See and the pope could freely carry out their spiritual mission of confirming Christians in the faith and guiding the universal church.

The transition from the Papal States to nationhood was a long and bumpy road.

Starting in the eighth century, the church wielded temporal power over what was known as the Papal States, a shifting group of territories across parts of modern-day Italy.

The popes at the time were territorial sovereigns and, as such, had to deal with the unpleasant risks and worries of foreign powers bent on invasion, rival Roman emperors and powerful Roman families vying for control of the papacy.

In the 19th century, revolutionaries fought against papal control in their struggle to unify Italy and the Papal States dissolved in 1870 after Rome and the surrounding territories were annexed to a unified country covering the entire peninsula.

A dispute with the Italian government over the sovereignty of the Holy See kept popes confined inside the walls of the Vatican from 1870 to 1929.

The dispute, which became known as the Roman Question, did not seem to have a quick and easy answer.

On the one hand, Italy had legitimate aspirations "to finally achieve its own state unity and, among other things, to designate as its capital Rome, which had been its point of reference for millennia," said a front-page article in the Vatican newspaper, L'Osservatore Romano, Feb. 11.

But on the other hand, it said, Rome was the see of Peter and his successors. The Holy See legitimately needed a formal and effective guarantee of its independence and freedom, "which are absolutely necessary for the pontiff in order to carry out his spiritual mission on a universal level," the paper said.

No pope wanted to compromise his task as shepherd of the universal church by being under the control and authority of a sovereign leader.

Years of negotiations under Pope Pius XI finally resulted in a resolution. Vatican officials and Italy's Prime Minister Benito Mussolini signed the Lateran Pacts of 1929 in which the Vatican and the Italian state recognized each other as sovereign nations.

Pope Pius, who is considered the founder of the new nation, now had an enormous, nonspiritual task before him: planning and building all the infrastructure that would be needed for the smooth functioning of an independent state on 109 acres of land.

A state from scratch

How Vatican City State was built up nearly from scratch is at the center of a new exhibit open in the Braccio di Carlo Magno hall in St. Peter's Square until May 10.

With wall-sized photographic displays and original artifacts from that period, the exhibit aims to send the visitor back in time to witness the birth of a unique nation.

Old maps show how, behind St. Peter's Basilica, acres of vineyards and vegetable gardens that had supplied homegrown goods to the pope and Vatican seminaries were razed to make way for the building of a governor's office.

The administrative office would come to coordinate the functions of some 20 agencies today, including the Vatican Museums and the offices responsible for security, personnel and building maintenance throughout the territory.

The governor's office continues to oversee all the new buildings that were erected under Pope Pius' direction, including the Vatican's railway station, electrical generating plant and radio.

While building a nation out of hilly fields and gardens may have seemed daunting, the Vatican did receive some technical and material help from Italy and even the United States.

The U.S. Western Electric Company and Bell Telephone Laboratories built and supplied the shortwave radio receiver that was used by the newly founded Vatican Radio.

The receiver still works and is turned on so visitors to the exhibition can hear, amid a lot of static, Vatican Radio programming.

Pope Pius had invited the inventor of the radio, Guglielmo Marconi, to build the radio broadcasting station, which was inaugurated Feb. 12, 1931. The exhibit shows a medium wave antenna, a carbon microphone and other instruments Marconi designed for Vatican Radio.

The U.S. International Telephone and Telegraph Corp., known as ITT, published the Vatican's first telephone book in 1930 and the church in the United States provided the Vatican with state-of-the-art equipment and technology for setting up its first central telephone exchange that same year.

The church in the United States also provided a gold and silver papal telephone, which is also on display. Made by ITT, the phone was used for decades, from the time of Pope Pius until the end of Pope John XXIII's pontificate.

A 1931 census report in the exhibit shows 711 people held Vatican citizenship and another 283 noncitizens were resident within its walls, for a total population of 994. The vast majority of citizens and residents were Italians.

The second largest group was formed by the Swiss, almost all of whom were members of the Swiss Guard protecting the pope.

The residents included 23 women, many of whom were married to members of the Swiss Guard. The census that year registered the births of five boys and six girls, who, by virtue of being born on Vatican territory, automatically became Vatican citizens.

A roundup of Scripture, readings, films and more

Engaging history book has much for general public, academicians

REVIEWED BY BROTHER JEFFREY GROS, FSC
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

The Iraq War has brought the presence of Christians in what was once Mesopotamia and Babylon to global attention.

However, what many do not recall is that these centers of the Christian faith were flourishing communities for centuries, with bishops, monasteries and universities, while Germany, Britain and France were still on the barbarian frontier.

Maps of early Christianity often center on the Mediterranean. However, some maps of the Middle Ages show Jerusalem at the center, with Beijing on the Asian right, Britain on the European left and the upper Nile Valley in Africa as the bottommost point, well before Poland and Scandinavia even appear as mission lands.

These ancient Persian and Syrian churches, which at one time rivaled the Latin- and Greek-speaking world in learning, missionary zeal and geographic extension, still exist and carry a significant heritage of our common 2,000 years of Gospel witness.

In 1984 Pope John Paul II and Syrian Patriarch Ignatius of Antioch (now resident in Damascus, and called in this volume the Jacobite Church) signed a common declaration on eucharistic sharing, based on agreements of the 1970s resolving disagreements on the nature and person of Christ dating from 451.

In 1994 a similar declaration was made with the patriarch of the Assyrian Church of the East (called here Nestorian), formerly of Baghdad and Persia, now resident in Chicago. These ancient and living Christian communities have a rich history, which now becomes part of our Catholic heritage and our common future.

In "The Lost History of Christianity: The Thousand-Year Golden Age of the Church in the Middle East, Africa and Asia — and How It Died," Philip Jenkins provides an engaging volume, whose clarity of style and accessible narrative belies the carefully researched and detailed documentation that lies behind such a readable story.

He outlines the rise, heritage and expansion of these churches in the early centuries with centers attributed to the apostles. He describes their successful missionary activity as far as China, India and Indonesia, their rich literary and theological production, and their evangelization of whole cultures.

He gives an engaging and differentiated view of the coming of Islam, its complex relations with its Jewish and Christian roots, and the variety of approaches it took to its Christian neighbors and subjects.

Like Christian relationships with Jews in Europe, periods of toleration alternate with periods of persecution.

The author gives the lie to those who would characterize the Muslim faith as any more violent in its history than Christianity, or even biblical Judaism. Intolerance, violence and persecution are common characteristics of particular moments in all of the great world religions.

Likewise, there are periods of peaceful coexistence and cultural interchange. He outlines the mutual support of the two and sometimes three communities at particular points in the story.

However, the common thread is the decline of many of these churches in their ancestral Christian homeland, and the extinction of some communities. What will also surprise some is that the final blow to many of these Christian communities came with the violence following World War I in Turkey and some other areas of the Middle East.

Jenkins also compares and contrasts the reasons for decline and the differences between some communities that went totally extinct, like Latin North Africa, and others that survived heartily, like Christian Spain before the reconquest of 1492 or the Coptic Orthodox Christians of Egypt.

The book, while descriptive and objective, ends with a series of provocative questions that challenge Christian wisdom and secular oversimplifications.

He explores in his last chapter what might be the foundation for a theology of Christian extinction, in the context of a doctrine of God, the church and providence, which attends as much to the vagaries of human history as to the successes of missionary endeavors.

This volume makes an engaging read for the general public and a useful resource for the historian of Christianity and the theologian exploring the doctrine of providence and God's action in human history.

Suffering can help us see value of life

BY JEAN DENTON
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

Yes, it's the season of Lent, but for many college students it is more famously the season of spring break — the annual week away from academic labors to rest, vacation or party.

But an increasingly popular activity on the college scene is "alternative spring break." The alternative these students choose is to use their week off for community service.

Theresa Eugenio, a Catholic campus minister who graduated from Virginia Tech last spring, will take a dozen students from her school on an alternative spring break trip next week to Flint, Mich.

Virginia Tech, remember, is where a troubled student killed 32 students and faculty members in a mass shooting two years ago. Theresa was a junior at the time. The effects of the tragedy are still palpable in the university community.

But when I visited with Theresa on the campus recently, she explained that the entire community's chosen response to its shared pain was a commitment to serve others.

"I wouldn't say (the event) defines us, but it changed who we are because of our response," she said.

In the immediate aftermath of the shootings, students realized the meaning of supporting and caring for one another, Theresa explained. The intense experience brought them new appreciation of the value of life.

Theresa said that a year after the shootings their campus ministry took a new theme: "going from victim to witness."

This week's Scriptures emphasize God's promise to save his people, made in his covenant with Noah. The promise, Peter says, is relived in our baptism as we are joined to Jesus in his resurrection.

Knowing their baptismal promise, the student ministers at Virginia Tech chose a positive response to the campus tragedy "because we understand the Resurrection story," Theresa said.

Their alternative spring break will include working with students at a high school beset by gang violence.

"We'll talk with them about how you can respond to violence. We have some experience with that," she said.

"We've learned that you can make a choice to honor others — those who have lost their lives and others you are close to — by making your life mean something."

Questions:

What event(s) in your life have helped you understand the Resurrection story? How have you made a life-giving response to personal suffering?

Scripture to be Illustrated:

"Beloved, Christ suffered for sins once ... that he might lead you to God" (1 Peter 3:18).

Catholic Navy wife's Web site aims to help military families cope

BY KATIE BAHR
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

FRONT ROYAL, Va. — Judy McCloskey has learned a lot about surviving in a military family.

A parishioner of St. John the Baptist Church in Front Royal, McCloskey is both a Navy wife and a mother of six, so she has firsthand knowledge of the sacrifices and struggles of faith that go along with a life spent serving one's country.

In 2000, McCloskey realized she wanted to help other Catholic military families try to live out their faith, so she went looking for an organization that would help her do so.

"I served as a sleuth determined to find an already existing lay apostolate focused on the spiritual edification of Catholics serving in the U.S. military — some place I could volunteer and get this out of my system," McCloskey said.

When she realized there was no such organization, McCloskey decided it was up to her to do it herself.

That was when she started the Web-based apostolate CatholicMil.org, which was launched on Christmas Eve in 2001. McCloskey now works full time using her own experiences to help offer guidance and comfort to other military families trying to stay balanced, whether they're stationed overseas or at home waiting for their loved ones to return.

"I wanted to share what I had discovered with other military families and that's exactly what I've done," McCloskey said.

According to the Web site, CatholicMil.org works to "spiritually edify" military families who have immediate family members serving on active duty.

It encourages priests and those entering the priesthood to consider being a military chaplain and serving the U.S. Archdiocese for the Military Services; priests who choose to be military chaplains with the permission of their local bishop are under the jurisdiction of the military archdiocese.

The site also is working on the sainthood cause of Father Vincent Capodanno, a chaplain who was killed while performing last rites for dying soldiers in Vietnam.

While McCloskey is pleased with the results of the Web site, she admitted it has been a huge challenge.

"If I knew then what I know now, would I have still started it? I'm not so sure," McCloskey said. "It's been exceptionally challenging, absolutely."

The hardest part of starting the organization, according to McCloskey, has been trying to juggle the demands of raising her children — sometimes by herself while her husband was deployed — while building the organization

She attributes the success of the Web site to the entire team of people who have worked on it and, of course, to God.

"It's one of those things where it was going to happen," McCloskey said. "God put a lot of the right people in my path and it was just like everything started to fall into place."

Today, CatholicMil.org works nationally and is recognized by the Department of Defense and supported by Army, Navy and Air Force chaplains.

The apostolate also has developed partnerships with organizations such as the Fulton Sheen Foundation, the National Catholic Register and Catholic Answers, and has donated more than $1.16 million in supplies to troops stationed all over the world.

Care packages include Bibles, rosaries and other Catholic items

"CatholicMil is doing what we can to help the too few priests we have ministering to those who serve," said McCloskey.

"Team CatholicMil does our part, and God truly blesses our efforts. God makes the impossible a reality," she said.

Music and song help listeners contemplate mystery of faith, says pope

BY CAROL GLATZ
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

VATICAN CITY — Music and song can help listeners reflect on the beauty and mystery of Christ, Pope Benedict XVI said.

Our Lady's Choral Society of the Archdiocese of Dublin, Ireland, and the Irish RTE Concert Orchestra performed Handel's "Messiah" Feb. 12 to mark the 80th anniversary of Vatican City State.

The pope told the guests and performers in the Vatican's Paul VI audience hall that the concert demonstrated how music and song easily can be woven together with faith in God.

"Music, like art, can be a particularly great way to proclaim Christ because it is able to eloquently render more perceptible the mystery" of the faith, he said.

The richness of music and harmonies of song "help us contemplate the intense and arcane mystery of Christian faith," he said.

The pope praised the orchestra and Poll shows residents of Southern states most religious in country on the list, while several states in the Northeast ranked the lowest.

After more than 350,000 interviews, the survey found that Southern states had the highest percentage of respondents who said they considered religion to be an important part of their daily lives.

Mississippi topped the list with 85 percent of those surveyed claiming that religion was important.

Vermont was named the least religious state, with just 42 percent of respondents there who said they were religious.

The data for the poll was collected throughout 2008 via telephone interviews of 355,334 U.S. residents over the age of 18.

According to the Princeton-based polling organization, the poll accounted for varying demographics within each state to ensure the accurate representation of the state's population.

Overall, Gallup found that the United States is generally a religious country.

Sixty-five percent of the total population said religion was an important part of their lives.

However, Gallup reported that in surveying countries around the world the median percentage of respondents who saw religion as part of their lives was 82 percent.

After Mississippi, the states with the highest percentage of residents who said religion was important to them were: Alabama (82), South Carolina (80), Tennessee (79), Louisiana and Arkansas (both 78), Georgia (76), North Carolina (76), Oklahoma (75), and Kentucky and Texas (both 74).

Just above Vermont at the bottom of the list was New Hampshire with 46 percent of residents who said religion was important; next came Maine and Massachusetts, both with 48.

Other states at the bottom were Alaska (51), Washington (52), Oregon and Rhode Island (both 53), Nevada (54) and Connecticut (55).

In the middle of the list, which included the District of Columbia (61), were Ohio and Iowa, where 65 percent and 64 percent, respectively, of residents put a high importance on religion in their lives.

In the Southwest, New Mexico ranked 21st on the list with 65 percent, and Arizona was 34th with 61 percent.

Researchers explained that ethnic and racial distribution could account for the different levels of religiosity across the country, with certain demographic groups in some states having stronger levels of religious affiliation.

Each state also has a different culture, which can impact the level of importance residents give religion in their lives, according to the poll.

Regarding other countries, a resounding 100 percent of residents in Egypt reported that religion was important in their lives.

On the other end of the spectrum, just 14 percent of the population in Estonia in northern Europe said they were religious.

Here's why "it's just not right"

Birth of octuplets helps make bioethics part of public conversation

It took the birth of eight children to accomplish this: Bioethics is now on the national agenda, part of the public conversation.

The facts are well-known: a California woman — already the mother of six children — gave birth in late-January to octuplets and has since been making the most of it on the publicity trail.

Nadya Suleman, unemployed, unmarried and irresponsible, has done what several popes and innumerable theologians and ethicists have been unable to do: interest people in the right and wrong of tinkering. Should we do something just because technology enables us to do it?

Suleman said all 14 children born to her are the result of in vitro fertilization from sperm donated by a friend. Besides the octuplets, her six other children, including a set of twins, range in age from 2 to 7.

"It was always a dream of mine to have a large family, a huge family," she said in the first of a several television interviews. "I just longed for certain connections that I really lacked, I believe, when I was growing up."

There is no evidence to suggest this is anything other than a rational, calculated act by one woman to satisfy selfish desires with little or no concern for the eventual effect on 14 human beings.

If Suleman wanted to do this for a warped but sincere reason, why then hire two publicists and glory in national publicity?

Her publicists say she is reviewing offers to write a book. (Under what title? The better are taken: "Eight Is Enough," "Cheaper by the Dozen" and "All My Children.")

The marketing is distasteful.

Reaction has dwelt on the public policy or economic question. Who is to tell a woman how many children she may have and by what method?

How will medical expenses surrounding the birth and future expenses be paid?

People feel there is something wrong with this, that "it's just not right."

Such artificial procreation violates moral principles, an attempt by man to "take the place of his Creator."

That was said in a document personally approved by the pope and released in December to update a 1987 instruction that rejected in vitro fertilization, human cloning, surrogate motherhood and nontherapeutic experiments with human embryos.

The primary rejection of in vitro, according to the Vatican document, is that it separates procreation from the conjugal act in marriage:

"The child has the right to be conceived, carried in the womb, brought into the world and brought up within marriage. It is through the secure and recognized relationship to his own parents that the child can discover his own identity and achieve his own proper human development."

The document further stated that "there are those who say that the moral teaching of the church contains too many prohibitions. In reality, however, her teaching is based on the recognition and promotion of all the gifts that the Creator has bestowed on man such as life, knowledge, freedom and more."

"Behind every no in the difficult task of discerning between good and evil there shines a great yes to the recognition of the dignity and inalienable value of every single and unique human being called into existence."

A child is a gift, not a right, not a product owned by the parents.

The state can petition a court for custody of children of an unfit mother. Suleman has proven to be just that.

There is a difference between parenting and breeding, a distinction not understood by Suleman.

A bright light of life

A tribute to Dr. Gilberto Dalmau Colina

If you have ever gotten lost in a foreign land, you know the unique feeling of isolation that comes when you don't know where you are and can't communicate with anyone.

For a refugee, the loneliness is more frightening because you don't have a home, a safe haven, a place you know you will eventually return to.

That was the feeling of my family when we came to Charlotte from Cuba in 1961. We had escaped the Communist oppression of Fidel Castro but were adrift in a place where we didn't know the language, customs or people — with one exception.

Dr. Gilberto Colina came to the United States from Cuba in 1932. In 1940, fresh out of the University of South Carolina with a degree in pharmacology, he settled in Charlotte.

Colina was an innovator. For more than 30 years he was the chief pharmacist at Mercy Hospital, where he developed many of the techniques and pharmacy protocols that are still in use. He taught pharmacy basics to young nurses and dental technicians. In 1958, he founded the Charlotte Poison Control Center, the first service of its kind in this area.

Over the past five decades many lives have been saved by the advice given for the care of accidental poisoning victims. But it was what he did in the early 1960s that Colina is fondly remembered for among the Cubans who came to Charlotte.

As refugees we gravitated toward the things that were familiar to us — for starters, that meant the Catholic Church. We were spread out among the parishes of St. Ann, St. Patrick, Our Lady of the Assumption and Our Lady of Consolation.

When we were sick, we chose the Catholic Mercy Hospital for treatment.

There we found a Cuban who helped us with medications and frequently gave us samples of vitamins.

Colina was someone who spoke our language, understood our culture and took the time to show us the way to survive and then thrive in this great land called America.

He helped us find homes, jobs, schools for the children and, ultimately, a safe haven.

When a member of my family was in the hospital, we would call Dr. Colina, who had a way of explaining what was going on that brought comfort to the sick and to all of us who were praying for a speedy recovery.

Beyond the list of professional achievements and humanitarian contributions to Charlotte, Colina was a man of warmth and unconditional love. Everyone who knew him came away with an unforgettable impression of a man who cared.

Colina died Feb. 1. He was 94. In heaven he joins the many souls he helped in Charlotte.

He will be missed, but the bright light of his life continues to shine through the love of the people like me who he helped.

Tony Lopez-Ibanez is a parishioner of St. Gabriel Church in Charlotte.

Action over thinking

The "Catholic social thinkers" who met with the Obama administration ("Catholic concerns: Obama administration gets advice from Catholic social thinkers," Feb. 6) do not express the views of most Catholics any more than Bishop Richard Williamson's denial of the Holocaust represents the views of most Catholics.

Consequences needed

Why doesn't the Catholic Church send a message to those lawmakers who are supporting anti-Catholic doctrine (such as, abortion) by excommunicating them?

If there are no consequences to be paid for their actions, why would we expect any changes in their beliefs?

The mystical body of Christ

'Miracle' crash landing a metaphor for Christian life

Recently, I had the opportunity to interview a good friend of mine — one of the 155 survivors of the “miracle on the Hudson,” the US Air flight 1549 that crashed into the Hudson River — while I was writing a story for a local newspaper.

Perhaps it was the magnitude of his ordeal, or maybe it was because we are close friends, but for whatever reason, his story made an extraordinary impact on my faith journey.

I found myself reflecting on his experience for days after the interview, reliving in my head the emergency landing. At the same time, I was trying to imagine what it would be like to face the possibility of such a tragic death without the chance to say goodbye to my family.

It was horrific, but it had a happy ending.

There has been much coverage of this miraculous emergency landing and I have followed it closely. Something that really struck me was the bond developed between the passengers and the flight crew after the crash — they said that surviving bonded them for life.

Immediately, I noticed the similarities to what we refer to in church doctrine as the “mystical body of Christ.”

“For just as the body is one and has many members, and all the members of the body, though many, are one body, so it is with Christ. For by one Spirit we were all baptized into one body” (1 Cor. 12:12-13a).

By virtue of our baptism we share in the life, death and resurrection of Jesus Christ — the miracle of miracles. Similarly, we, by the same baptism, are a part of the “miracle on the Hudson” — as the crash is a great metaphor for the Christian life.

The plane is a metaphor for Jesus, the river is Calvary and the pilot is a figure of God, always in control in the midst of external chaos, always looking out for his passengers’ safeguard.

And the passengers are all of us — everyone — since we are the mystical body of Christ.

The plane had to be ditched in the water for survival in the same way

Jesus had to be crucified on the cross to die for our eternal survival. The timely rescue, minutes later, is like his timely resurrection three days later.

“If one member suffers, all suffer together; if one member is honored, all rejoice together” (1 Cor. 12:26).

Because of the “miracle of Calvary,” all Christians share a similar, if not stronger, bond with those 155 people aboard flight 1549. As a part of Christ’s body, we participate and relive in our daily lives his passion, death and resurrection.

So let us rejoice together with them and give thanks to God for the “miracle on the Hudson.” And let us not forget that, no matter how severe a share of Calvary we face presently, it will have a happy ending.

With its diversity, Catholic Church is united in Christ, pope says

The Pope Speaks

POPE
BENEDICT XVI

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — The Catholic Church is not limited to one particular culture or language, but with its diversity it is united in Christ, Pope Benedict XVI said.

The catholicity of the church reflects a “fidelity to tradition together with being open to developments in history” and to the search for unity in the diversity of cultures, the pope said Feb. 18 during his weekly general audience in St. Peter’s Square.

The pope’s talk focused on St. Bede the Venerable, an eighth-century Christian writer and doctor of the church. The British saint saw the church grow from being rooted in Jewish, Greek and Roman cultures to becoming a truly universal body, he said.

“The church is not restricted to one particular culture, but is made up of all cultures of the world that are open and they find their point of destination in Christ,” he said.

The pope said St. Bede’s “rich ecclesial, liturgical and historical vision enabled his writings to serve as a guide” that is still useful today for Catholic teachers, pastors and parents.

Here is the text of the pope’s audience remarks in English.

Dear Brothers and Sisters,

In our catechesis on the early Christian writers of East and West, we now turn to St. Bede the Venerable.

A monk of the monastery of Wearmouth in England, Bede became one of the most learned men of the early Middle Ages and a prolific author, while also gaining a reputation for great holiness and wisdom.

His scriptural commentaries highlight the unity of the Old and New Testaments, centered on the mystery of Christ and the church. Bede is best known, however, for his historical writings, in which he traced the history of the church from the Acts of the Apostles, through the age of the Fathers and councils, and down to his own times.

His ecclesiastical history recounts the church’s missionary expansion and growth among the English people. Bede’s rich ecclesial, liturgical and historical vision enable his writings to serve as a guide for the church’s teachers, pastors and religious in living out their vocations in the service of the church’s mission. His great learning and the sanctity of his life earned Bede the title of “venerable,” while the rapid spread of his writings made him a highly influential figure in the building of a Christian Europe.

Dealing with job-search discouragement

Persistence can activate hidden optimism within us

Several weeks ago, Microsoft eliminated 5,000 jobs and IBM notified an undisclosed number of employees that they would be subject to a “resource action.” That’s a new term for layoffs. Hundreds of thousands are out of work and looking.

Some job seekers find themselves for the first time asking someone else for help. They find this distasteful.

Unaccustomed as they are to asking for help, they are even less prepared for the refusal and rejection those requests will draw. Not flat-out rejections; those will be rare.

But letters have a way of being set aside, resumes get lost, promised calls become promises broken.

This leaves the job seeker even more alone and much discouraged.

Below these surface-level disappointments lies a substratum of discouragement in many that calls out for the durability of hope; a call that does not ordinarily get an immediate response.

Hope is needed to provide the courage to endure. Those who experience job loss need immediate and repeated assurance that they have not been laid off from life.

Back in the 1960s when college students were supposed to be unreflective activists, Jim Beek, a student at Loyola College in Baltimore, wrote a poem for the campus literary quarterly that speaks to the heart of the problem the person searching for work has to confront.

The poem opened with the line: “I awoke in the silent fist of the night gagging on loneliness.” Then, several lines later, Beek writes: “And the fear that my existence wasn’t doing/ anyone any good/ Was under my fifth rib.”

So he prays “to a god who would have nothing to do with a stained-glass window,” and gets this reply: “Son/ This is the pain that lets you know you’re alive.”

The fear that your existence isn’t “doing anyone any good” adds a lot of heavy freight to a job seeker’s discouragement.

If, as the psychologists remind us, depression is inverted anger — i.e., anger turned in on itself — discouragement might be thought of as an aching awareness of not being needed.

The pain is there “under my fifth rib” all right, but it can serve as a reminder that the job-seeker is alive, a full member of the human race, ready to contribute and walking a path of persistence that leads to another job.

There’s that word: persistence. Discouragement erodes it, undercuts it, puts the fire out.

The really discouraged person stops looking. The persistent person never gives up.

Persistence can activate the optimism that lies hidden in the inner person, somewhere in the nervous system, ready to spring.

But you have to try it to become convinced. You have to believe that the other side of every “out” is “in,” and that any exit is an entrance in reverse. Every ouster is the starting gate for a comeback.

You deal with discouragement by not giving up. You simply decide not to live your life “back there”; dredging up the past can be a real depressant.

You decide to take life one day at a time, asking yourself: What is most important in my life right now?

And you know, as you look at your potential, your family responsibilities and the economic realities of your existence, you realize that the most important thing for you right now is getting a job.

Add your personal “Amen” to William Faulkner’s line in his Nobel Prize acceptance speech: “I believe that man [woman would, of course, be specifically included today] will not merely endure: He will prevail.”

"She was an inspiration to me and to so many others."

Crash claims 9/11 widow heading to Jesuit school's scholarship event

BY CAROL ZIMMERMANN
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

WASHINGTON — Beverly Eckert, a victim of the Feb. 12 plane crash near Buffalo, N.Y., was en route to present a scholarship award in honor of her late husband at Jesuit-run Canisius High School in Buffalo.

Eckert, a Sept. 11 widow, also had planned to take part in a weekend celebration in Buffalo of what would have been her husband's 58th birthday.

Her husband, Sean Rooney, died in the terrorist attacks on the World Trade Center. That day he spoke to his wife by cell phone up until the second tower — where he was trapped — collapsed. A vice president for risk management services at the Aon Corp., he worked on the 98th floor.

Eckert, a resident of Stamford, Conn., was aboard Continental Flight 3407 from Newark, N.J., to Buffalo when it crashed into a home seven miles from the Buffalo Niagara International Airport, killing all 49 passengers and crew and one person on the ground.

According to initial reports, the plane was coming in for a landing through light snow and fog. Witnesses said they heard the plane's engines sputtering before it struck the house in a fiery explosion.

Eckert, 57, had long been an active voice for the Sept. 11 victims. She founded an advocacy group called Voices of September 11th. She also co-chaired the 9/11 Family Steering Committee, a group that investigated potential failures by the U.S. government that may have led to the terrorist attacks.

She also lobbied Congress to pass intelligence reform, spearheaded protests for more land for a memorial at ground zero, and pushed for a compensation fund for family members of the 9/11 victims.

In early February, Eckert attended a White House meeting with President Barack Obama, along with other 9/11 activists, to discuss how the new administration would handle terror suspects.

"Beverly lost her husband on 9/11 and became a tireless advocate for those families whose lives were forever changed on that September day," Obama said during a Feb. 13 White House event.

"In keeping with that passionate commitment, she was on her way to Buffalo to mark what would have been her husband's birthday and launch a scholarship in his memory," he said.

"So she was an inspiration to me and to so many others, and I pray that her family finds peace and comfort in the hard days ahead," said the president.

At Canisius High School, Eckert was active in the school's capital campaign and in supporting the Sean Rooney Memorial Scholarship established in 2002. Rooney was a member of the class of '69, one year behind another Canisius graduate, NBC News journalist Tim Russert, who died last year.

Eckert, who met Rooney at a Canisius dance when they were 16, also had been raising funds to name one of the school's new science labs in her husband's memory.

The Feb. 13 scholarship presentation she planned to attend has been postponed.

"Beverly was a lovely woman who spent the last several years working hard to take the tragedy of Sean's death and have something positive come from it," said John Knight, president of Canisius High School, in a Feb. 13 statement.

"She was committed to Canisius and the outstanding education her husband received," he added.

The Rooney scholarship is awarded to a high-achieving student who demonstrates financial need. When possible, the award is given to a graduate of the Catholic Academy of West Buffalo, where Rooney attended elementary school, or to a west Buffalo resident.

The first recipient of the scholarship was Remy Uwilingiyimana, who fled from Rwanda in 1995.

Eckert wrote in a 2006 letter to the school that the memorial scholarship had "more than exceeded my expectations of finding some way to counteract the destructive intent of terrorism."

Judy McGary talks to a reporter about the commitment she and her husband, John, have made to organic farming while John sorts spring salad mix into containers for their customers at their farm in Petersburg, Tenn., Dec. 18. The McGarys, who have been married 48 years, retired from their first careers and now run a vegetable farm and participate in a community-supported agriculture program.

Retired couple's farming practices benefit community

PETERSBURG, Tenn. (CNS) — On a chilly and damp winter morning, John McGary kneels in front of row upon row of green leafy vegetables, sorting through freshly picked spring salad mix and carefully packing it into plastic containers for his customers.

He and his wife of 48 years, Judy McGary, will deliver the salad mix, tucked into a box alongside sweet potatoes, butternut squashes, radishes, greens and apples, to drop-off points in Nashville later that day.

"There's nothing like taking these boxes of fresh vegetables to families and seeing how excited they are," said Judy McGary.

Nestled in the rolling hills of Lincoln County near the Alabama border, the farm operated by the McGarys is one of the few vegetable farms in an area where most land is devoted to cattle and horse farming.

The McGarys also have the distinction of being one of the few certified organic community-supported agriculture programs in the state that operates through the winter. In a community-supported agriculture program, customers purchase a "share" of the crops that are grown, and in return get a box of produce.

Instead of easing into retirement like many couples their age, the McGarys work the land every day, growing and harvesting vegetables and driving hundreds of miles a week to deliver them.

"Our children think we are crazy to be working so hard at our ages, but we have been blessed with good health and feel that we are being good stewards of our land which is dedicated to growing food for our farm supporters' tables," said Judy McGary, the mother of three grown children.

With no other regular employees, John, 70, a retired electrical engineer, and Judy, 67, a retired nurse, do everything from planting seeds to marketing the business themselves.

When they were both sick for two weeks during the fall, they still had to harvest and deliver the produce on time. When deer "picked the tomatoes clean" one growing season, the McGarys had to scramble to fill the customers' boxes with an alternate vegetable.

While they have never missed a delivery, "some weeks we haven't been able to deliver what we would have liked," John McGary said.

"A lot of things are not in your control," added his wife, a lifelong Catholic whose home parish is Holy Spirit Church in Huntsville, Ala. "Faith plays a real important part in farming, and everything you do," she added.

This winter season, 65 families signed up to receive a weekly box of produce from them. Since the subscribers know they will receive only what the farmer has available, they agree to share in the rewards and risks that befall the farmer.

Community-supported agriculture, said Judy McGary, "is about building relationships."

With 150 shares sold to customers last summer, the McGarys expect even more this year. But, Judy McGary said, "the organic farming movement is still finding its place in the world."

However, John McGary added, "our customers are willing to sacrifice a little to get fresh, local food."

Argentina gives traditionalist bishop 10 days to leave country

Government says comments insulted society, Jews

BUENOS AIRES, Argentina (CNS) — The government of Argentina announced Feb. 19 that traditionalist Bishop Richard Williamson had 10 days to leave the country or be expelled, news media reported.

The Interior Ministry said British-born Bishop Williamson "has concealed the true motive for his stay in the country" because he said he was an employee of a nongovernmental group when he was serving as rector of the seminary of the Society of St. Pius X in La Reja for the past five years.

The government also said Bishop Williamson's remarks that the Holocaust was exaggerated and that no Jews died in Nazi gas chambers insulted and offended Argentine society and the Jewish community.

Bishop Williamson was removed as head of the seminary in La Reja in early February.

In January Pope Benedict XVI lifted the excommunication of Bishop Williamson and three other traditionalist bishops.

The bishops were ordained against papal orders in 1988 by the late French Archbishop Marcel Lefebvre, founder of the Society of St. Pius X.

The Vatican later published a statement saying that Bishop Williamson would not be welcomed into full communion with the church unless he disavowed his remarks about the Holocaust and publicly apologized.

Bishop Richard Williamson complied with the 10-day deadline and boarded a plane to London Feb. 24.

Pope says papal role is one of authority, service

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Pope Benedict XVI said the papacy is a role of authority and service in the church, and he asked for the prayers of Catholics so that he can accomplish the tasks entrusted to him.

The pope made the remarks to pilgrims at his Sunday blessing at the Vatican Feb. 22, the feast of the Chair of St. Peter.

He said the chair of St. Peter "symbolizes the authority of the bishop of Rome, who is called to carry out a special service for the whole people of God."

He said the unique ministry of the pope was confirmed by the Second Vatican Council, which spoke of papal primacy as presiding over particular churches in a universal communion of charity.

Part of the pope's role is to protect legitimate differences while assuring that such differences do not hinder unity, he said.

Pope Benedict, noting the approach of Lent, also spoke of the need for penitence. He said the Gospel reading about the paralytic cured by Jesus showed that Christ had the power to forgive sins as well as effect physical healing.

"Sin is a type of paralysis of the spirit from which only the power of God's merciful love can free us, allowing us to pick ourselves up and resume the path of good," he said.

He asked Mary to open people's hearts to conversion during this year's Lenten season. The pope celebrated an Ash Wednesday liturgy Feb. 25 in Rome, and will make a weeklong Lenten retreat in early March.

Catholic Church activity in Vietnam is not political, says Vatican

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — A Vatican delegation told Vietnamese officials that the Catholic Church's religious activities there would not be conducted for political purposes.

Msgr. Pietro Parolin, Vatican undersecretary of state, led the delegation to Vietnam Feb. 16-17 for meetings with officials of the central government to discuss the possibility of establishing full diplomatic relations.

The Vatican officials also visited the government committee for religious affairs, the Catholic bishops' conference, and the Thai Binh and Bui Chu dioceses.

In a statement Feb. 20, the Vatican press office said the latest round of talks showed that "positive progress has been made in the religious life in Vietnam." It expressed the hope that unsolved bilateral questions between Vietnam and the Holy See "could be settled with good will through sincere dialogue."

Msgr. Parolin told Vietnamese officials that the Vatican respects Vietnam's independence and sovereignty and that the church's religious activities are not conducted for political purposes.

The Vatican official told them the church "invites the faithful to be good citizens, working for the common good of the country," the statement said.

The Vatican and Vietnam do not have diplomatic relations, but Vatican diplomats make annual visits to Vietnam to discuss church-state relations and specific questions related to the appointment of bishops, seminary enrollment and the functioning of Catholic institutions.

There are continued restrictions on Catholic life in the country and the Vietnamese government continues to insist on approving the candidates for bishop before the pope names them officially.

According to the Vatican statement, the head of the Vietnamese delegation, Vice Minister of Foreign Affairs Nguyen Quoc Cuong, emphasized that Vietnam had a "consistent policy on the freedom of belief."

The Vietnamese official expressed his hopes that the Vatican would continue to actively contribute to the life of the Catholic community in Vietnam, that relations between religious groups and all people in Vietnam would be strengthened, and that the Catholic Church would further unite itself with Vietnam through its practical contributions toward the building of society.

The talks represented the first time the Vietnam-Vatican Joint Working Group convened and both sides agreed that the first meeting of the group "was a new and important step forward in their bilateral relations."

They also agreed that "greater efforts should be made to further promote bilateral ties." Nothing official had yet been set on where and when the next Joint Working Group meeting would be held.

Welcome ministry says goodbye

Group leaves behind legacy of hospitality

CHARLOTTE — After many years of saying hello to new parishioners, one of the oldest ministries at St. Gabriel Church in Charlotte is saying goodbye.

The Handmaids of Mary has served as a welcome committee for new parishioners since shortly after the church was established in 1957.

The group, which began as a chapter of the worldwide organization, the Legion of Mary became a parish ministry under its new name in 1989.

Their purpose was to welcome new parishioners to the parish, originally by home visits and eventually by phone calls.

"We met weekly and said the rosary in the chapel," said Nell Farley, who has overseen the ministry for the past 26 years.

Each week the group acquired the names of new parish registrants.

"We would all take some of them and give them a call," Farley said.

"The blessing to the parishioners of St. Gabriel from the Handmaids of Mary has been the many rosaries prayed for them," said Deacon Ben Wenning, permanent deacon at St. Gabriel Church.

"And that each and every one of them was made to feel welcome

"The blessing to the parishioners ... has been the many rosaries prayed for them."

by a visit or a phone call after they registered," he added.

In recent years, the group's numbers have dwindled, which is the primary reason they are ending the ministry.

"We're getting up in years," said Farley, who added that the need for their service isn't as necessary as it once was.

When Farley joined the group back in 1982, there weren't as many ways for parishioners to get involved at the church.

"At that time there weren't the ministries that we now have," she said. "Our church does a lot of other things to welcome new members."

Please pray for the following priests who died during the month of March:

Oblates of St. Francis de Sales to leave parish after 18 years

GREENSBORO — After nearly two decades of parish service, the Oblates of St. Francis de Sales are leaving St. Paul the Apostle Church in Greensboro.

Bishop Peter J. Jugis and Oblate Father James J. Greenfield, provincial of the Oblates of St. Francis de Sales, made the announcement in a press release Feb. 18.

The Oblates have staffed the parish of 1,433 families since 1991. Oblate Father William Ruhl has been pastor since 2004.

The Oblates will continue to staff and serve four other parishes in the Diocese of Charlotte. The departure from St. Paul the Apostle Church is due to Father Ruhl's upcoming retirement in combination with other commitments by the religious order.

"The retirement of Father Ruhl from his ministry as pastor and our inability to replace him requires us to make the hard decision to end an 18-year relationship with the people of St. Paul the Apostle," said Father Greenfield.

"Even as we look forward to a continued presence in the Diocese of Charlotte, we will miss sharing our Salesian spirituality with the people of Greensboro," he said.

Father Ruhl is scheduled to leave the parish in early July 2009. A diocesan priest will be appointed as pastor.

"I thank the Oblates of St. Francis de Sales for their faithful service to the people of St. Paul the Apostle Parish," said Bishop Jugis.

"The dedication of the Oblates and of the many other religious order priests who serve in our diocese ensures that we can continue to bring the light of Christ to our growing Catholic communities," he said.

The Oblates of St. Francis de Sales is a religious order of priests and brothers who serve to connect the Gospel with the lives of people in the gentle and humble example of their patron, St. Francis de Sales. The Wilmington-Philadelphia province of the Oblates of St. Francis de Sales serves in parishes, schools and other ministries from Boston to Southwest Florida.

A brief history of St. Paul the Apostle Church

The Catholic community of St. Paul the Apostle Church was founded in July 1974, when then-Bishop Michael J. Begley of Charlotte invited the Paulist Fathers to create the fifth parish in Guilford County.

While the Paulists ministered to the ever-growing parish, they also served in campus ministry to Catholic students attending Guilford College, Greensboro College and the University of North Carolina at Greensboro. This ministry developed into the Catholic Student Fellowship.

The Paulist Fathers served until 1991, when the Oblates of St. Francis de Sales assumed pastoral leadership of the parish and Oblate Father James O'Neill was appointed pastor.

At that time the parish was composed of almost 1,000 families, and Father O'Neill immediately began plans to enlarge the church facilities. By 1998, the parish had grown to about 1,900 households with more than 5,500 people.

Father O'Neill served until April 2002. Oblate Father Tom Murphy, who came with Father O'Neill in 1991 as parochial vicar, returned in April 2002 as pastor.

Oblate Father William Ruhl assumed the pastorate of St. Paul the Apostle Church in July 2004.

Convert recalls journey from Judaism to Catholicism

he began preparation for his Bar Mitzvah at the age of 13 that he was really introduced to his Jewish faith.

At that time, he met regularly with a rabbi to learn how to cantor the readings.

"I didn't really know much about Christianity," he said.

"I had heard the name Jesus," Reiser said, but it was in a historical context.

"I learned to ski on the Sea of Galilee," said Reiser, who at the time was unaware of the significance of the place where Jesus had walked on water.

Jesus was "some person in history," he said, "maybe a prophet who roamed around the land where I was living."

In 1965, Reiser moved with his family to New York. The town where they lived was 50 percent Jewish and 50 percent Catholic.

"My curiosity started perking a little bit," Reiser said.

In 1968, Reiser enrolled in St. Louis University, a Jesuit school. It was around that same time that he began attending a Baptist church.

"I just started listening," said Reiser, who began researching Christianity and reading the prophets.

Then on Palm Sunday 1977, "it just came to me," he said. "Jesus was the Messiah."

Soon after that, Reiser was baptized at that Baptist church.

A test of faith

In 1978, Reiser embarked on a career as an FBI agent. His first assignment was in Minneapolis, Minn.

There he joined another Baptist church, but this time he "started following the preacher instead of God."

During an undercover investigation of a false accreditation and diploma manufacturing ring, Reiser discovered that the preacher he had been following was a fraud.

"That really turned me off," he said. "I basically fell away for quite a while."

Then he was transferred to Puerto Rico, where he met his future wife — a Catholic.

Coming home

While attending Mass one Sunday with Maria, his wife-to-be, Reiser was surprised by the familiarity of the Catholic liturgy.

"Once I paid attention to the Mass, I felt right at home," he said. "It brought me back to my Jewish traditions."

From Puerto Rico, Reiser was transferred to Charlotte, where he began attending Mass with his wife at St. Patrick Cathedral.

After attending Mass on a regular basis, Reiser was approached by a friend who asked if he would be interested in learning more about the Catholic Church.

"I started coming to inquiry classes," said Reiser, referring to the non-committal precursor to the Rite of Christian Initiation of Adults (RCIA) program.

The period of inquiry provided Reiser with an opportunity to ask questions and see if he was really interested in joining the church.

He enrolled formally in RCIA at Our Lady of the Assumption Church in Charlotte and converted to Catholicism in 1993 on the feast of the Assumption.

"I've been active ever since," Reiser said.

A bumpy road

Reiser's choice to convert to Catholicism was met with opposition from his family. His mother, who came from a traditional Jewish background and lost her parents in the Holocaust, was especially unhappy with his decision.

"I had to take a very delicate route with her," Reiser admitted.

Even now, he said, "religion is kind of off limits."

Three years ago, Reiser's younger brother converted to Catholicism.

Reiser assumed it was the influence of friends but came to find out that it was his own faith journey that led his brother to the church.

"He saw something there in me that made him follow the path," Reiser said.

A continuing journey

After working in Charlotte for a few years, Reiser was transferred back to Puerto Rico, where he and Maria became very active in their local parish.

"We really had a great community there," he said.

From there he was transferred to FBI headquarters in Washington, D.C., where they stayed until he retired in 2003.

After that, the Reisers moved back to Charlotte, where they settled at Our Lady of the Assumption Church.

"Assumption has always been home," Reiser said.

In recent years, Reiser has felt a calling to do God's work.

COURTESY PHOTO

David Reiser is pictured with Maria, his wife, and Blessed Mother Teresa of Calcutta during Mother Teresa's visit to Charlotte in 1995. Reiser, who converted from Judaism to Catholicism, is currently the faith formation coordinator at Our Lady of the Assumption Church in Charlotte.

When the position of faith formation coordinator became vacant at Our Lady of the Assumption Church, Reiser approached Father Philip Scarcella, pastor, and asked for the position.

"I said, 'I don't know anything about faith formation, but I'll give it a try if you're willing to trust me,'" Reiser said.

Father Scarcella took him up on the offer and Reiser has held the position ever since. When he became coordinator just three years ago, there were 175 children in the program.

Today enrollment is up to 600 students and classes are offered in both English and Spanish.

"I like it," he said. "I enjoy the kids and I enjoy the families."

Inspiration

One of the greatest religious influences for Reiser was an up-close encounter with Blessed Mother Teresa of Calcutta during her visit to Charlotte in 1995.

"I got a call one day at home, asking me if I wanted to be on the security detail for Mother Teresa," Reiser said.

When the security team picked her up from the airport to take her to the Charlotte Coliseum where she was to make an appearance, Reiser said he really didn't know what to expect.

When they arrived, "the place was packed. I was in awe," he said.

The next day, Reiser and his wife were invited to a private Mass with Mother Teresa at the newly-established convent of the Missionaries of Charity in Charlotte.

Right after Mass, "she came up to us and wanted to talk to us alone," Reiser said. "She was so warm and so loving."

"She's been a great influence on us, there is no doubt about that," he said.

Still learning

Reiser is currently enrolled in the permanent diaconate program and scheduled to be ordained as a deacon for the Diocese of Charlotte in 2011.

He is continuing on his faith journey, but he hasn't forgotten about his Jewish roots.

One of the things he said he likes most about the Catholic faith is "the whole order of the Mass."

"The Mass itself is the recreation of the Passover," he said.

On March 17, Reiser will give a talk at St. Thomas Aquinas Church in Charlotte, comparing Passover to the Mass.

"Jesus was Jewish, Mary was Jewish," said Reiser.

"I'm still Jewish," he added, but "you might say I'm a completed Jew; I recognize Jesus as the Messiah."

"Generally, I am in awe whenever I encounter someone who converts to the Catholic Church," said Dr. Cris Villapando, director of faith formation programs for the Diocese of Charlotte.

"In awe because I know that what has happened is the work of God," said Villapando. "But when someone converts from Judaism to Christianity, as in the case of David, I am even more in awe because I know that for more than 2,000 years, the Jewish people have always believed themselves to be the chosen people."

"Thus David's decision to become Catholic presents a unique faith journey demonstrating that in no way does his conversion contradict God's election. Rather, it demonstrates in its fullness what it means to be a chosen people today," he said.

Cross International Catholic Outreach Expands into Central, South America to Serve the Poor

On hot days, a cool breeze is a mixed blessing for the staff of Potter's House in Guatemala. The reason? Within a stone's throw of the organization's office is a massive public dump, reeking of rotting garbage and teeming with insects and disease. On hot afternoons — and there are many — the pungent odors carried in by a breeze can be overwhelming, literally enough to take your breath away.

Why would anyone locate their staff so close to such a terrible place?

"Jesus brought his mercy to the poorest of the poor, and he was willing to go wherever that took him. Potter's House is doing the same. There are nearly ten thousand people scavenging on this dump. Many are even forced to live in makeshift shacks in and around the garbage. Potter's House and its staff located here for a simple but profound reason — because they've come to serve with five different ministries for local families, including a feeding program and educational outreach. They've come to be the face of Christ to these people in desperate need," explains Jim Cavnar, president of Cross International Catholic Outreach, a major U.S.-based relief organization which recently expanded its global outreach into several Central American and South American countries. "When we American Catholics support organizations like this, we do our small part to keep Christ's Gospel of mercy alive in a desperate place. We help create a light in the darkness."

While visiting the ecumenical ministry, Cavnar sees that light produce a spark of hope. He meets Lorena, a woman with four children who is now on a better path. Lorena had been scavenging the dump from age 14, and she had every expectation that her life and the lives of her children would end here.

"My daily prayer had always been, 'God, help me to find enough to feed my family today,'" she explains. "On a good day, I would scavenge enough glass and plastic to make a few dollars. Then, we could eat again."

Now, with help from Potter's House, Lorena is receiving an education — an opportunity she never thought would be available to her. Her spirit is renewed, and she can now envision a day when she and her children will be able to leave this place, never to work on the dump again.

"Giving people this kind of opportunity to succeed in life is a privilege. At Cross International Catholic Outreach, we try to encourage American Catholics to see themselves as a tool in God's hands to bring about this kind of transformation. Working together — American Catholics and parish ministries overseas — we can have a huge impact in countries like Guatemala, Honduras, Nicaragua, Ecuador and Peru," Cavnar says. "That's why we are here and why we are committed to staying. We have a gift of hope to offer these people, and we believe it's a blessing to both the poor and to the American Catholics who support the outreach."

In Nicaragua, where the poor struggle with similar burdens, Cross International Catholic Outreach has already identified several Catholic organizations with effective programs in need of support: Our Little Brothers & Sisters orphanage, the Father Fabretto Center, Casa Alianza and the Christ the Healer Orphanage.

"Like Potter's House, Casa Alianza is another light in the darkness. It is a home for runaway children — many the victims of sexual exploitation. In addition to providing food and shelter for the children, they also want to provide medical care, spiritual guidance and counseling," Cavnar explains. "It's a profoundly moving experience to visit here. When you look into the faces of the children, you see their gratitude and you understand how critical it is for them to have this safe haven. You realize that this intervention is nothing less than a life-and-death rescue, because without this opportunity, these children would have faced a terrible fate."

with the program's Catholic directors, Cross commits funds for the medical care and feeding of the children. The ministry is deeply grateful for the support which will lift a major financial burden and allow the staff to further expand its services to the children.

"This is just one example of the hundreds of outreaches we hope to assist throughout Central and South America in the years ahead," Cavnar says. "And I'm confident we will have the support of Catholics throughout the U.S. as we move forward with this expansion. Like me, I'm sure they realize that the needs in this part of the world exemplify Christ's admonition: love your neighbor. They understand that we in America have a special calling to be the 'good Samaritan' to this part of the world — an area so close to our shores."

And, in the end, this Biblical call to love is what directs Cross International Catholic Outreach and its recent expansion, Cavnar says.

"Yes — above all else, we are drawn here by the love of God. We see the parish missions serving the poor as our brothers and sisters, worthy of our support. We see the suffering children and parents as our Catholic family, tied to us by both the faith they practice and by the mysterious bonds that bind all Christians together in an eternal destiny with our Lord. As the Apostle Paul said: these three remain: faith, hope and love. But the greatest of these is love. He knew that in heaven before God, our faith will no longer be necessary and our hope will be fulfilled, but our love — the love we have shown to those in need here on earth — will live on with us in eternity."

Cross Recognized, Endorsed by U.S. Catholic Bishops

As Cross International Catholic Outreach has continued to extend the range of its relief work to help the poor overseas, a growing number of Catholic bishops in the United States are taking notice and commending the organization for its efforts.

"We've had many endorsement letters come in the last year or so, and our staff is encouraged by the kind words and well wishes these bishops have shared," explained James Cavnar, president of Cross International Catholic Outreach. "It motivates us to want to push harder and do even more."

Most Reverend Gerald Barbarito shared: "Seeing Christ in the poor and extending assistance in His name is the very core of what we are about as Church. You are to be commended."

Most Reverend Timothy Dolan was equally enthusiastic, saying: "I am pleased to wholeheartedly endorse Cross International Catholic Outreach. It is my hope that the clergy will familiarize themselves with Cross and its outreach and share Cross' message with their parishioners."

Most Reverend Tod Brown has a similar position, explaining: "As a universal Church, it is our duty to become aware of and support the missionary works of the church. I heartily endorse Cross International Catholic Outreach, its worthwhile mission and its dedicated preachers."

Most Reverend Curtis Gillory, singled out the ministry's good stewardship of funds, saying: "I realize the great assistance that Cross International Catholic Outreach provides for the poor at a very cost effective rate. I want to be supportive of Cross in whatever way we are able to do so."

Cavnar is inspired by these endorsements and the notes of encouragement coming in from other U.S. bishops, but he feels the praise should really be aimed at the thousands of American Catholics who contribute to Cross and make the ministry's work possible.

"None of what we do would be possible without the donations we receive from the men, women and children in parishes from across this country. Those gifts, large or small, are what give us the financial power to send the food, dig the wells for water, build the houses, deliver the medicines, open the schools — everything," Cavnar said. "I say,

God bless those benefactors. God bless their generosity and their willingness to sacrifice for the benefit of others. Their commitment to helping the poor has made all of this possible."

American Catholics Are "Catalysts of Change" Overseas, Bringing Long-Term Blessings to Impoverished Families

He usually tries to be up and out on the road at least an hour before the sun rises. For Carlos, starting early means reaching the dump before any of the morning garbage trucks have arrived. As a scout, it's his job to locate and follow the huge lumbering vehicles to their drop off point, assessing the value of their loads and running home to get his parents and siblings if the loads they carry look promising. Gleaning salvageable food, plastics and other useful discards from the dump are critical to his family's daily survival. And because Carlos doesn't have the opportunity to attend school, these scavenging expeditions may soon become the twelve-year-old's only way of life — a future he will eventually be forced to pass on to his own children.

Priscilla is more fortunate than many of the women in rural Kenya. Through various odd jobs, she is able to help her husband sustain the family and keep their daughter fed. She also has a modest education and a limited ability to read. These "blessings from God" give her greater hope that her own daughter will have even better opportunities — that the next generation will break free from the bondage of poverty that has plagued her family for generations. But these dreams have a cost, and she must find a way to pay school fees and purchase supplies to achieve her ambitious goal. At this point, she's unsure how to stretch their budget any further without sacrificing daily meals which would threaten her child's health.

From all outward appearances, 74-year-old Evelyn is the prototypical grandmother. Her deeply lined face is full of quiet grace, and she exudes a spirit brimming with warmth and hospitality. It's hard to accept the fact that she is also one of Guyana's better tarantula hunters. Wearing pants and a long-sleeve shirt in the 90-degree heat because "you get bit a lot less," she collects the huge, hairy spiders for sale to those who use them for manufacturing anti-venom or as pets — earning just 10 cents per insect. The best hunting area, she says, is in the deep jungle about a two-hour walk beyond her village. It's hard work, but her survival and the futures of her precious grand-children depend on it. The little bit of money she collects allows her to buy their "daily bread."

"People who believe that the poor in developing countries lack initiative and are unwilling to work are either closing their eyes to the truth or they're just rationalizing reality away in order to soothe their own conscience. I've been to all of these areas myself and I've seen what life is like. Poverty isn't the choice of the lazy. It's the result of being born into difficult circumstances — into areas where people live under a crushing burden of poverty and opportunities for improvement are few and far between," explained James Cavnar, president of Cross International Catholic Outreach, a relief and development ministry active in nearly 25 countries around the globe. "What these critical people need to ask themselves is, 'why was I blessed by God to be born in a country like America?' They should be realizing, 'there but by the grace of God go I. This poor, struggling soul could just as easily have been me.'"

This perspective and its recognition of the hardships found in developing countries were instrumental in rethinking his own views, Cavnar said, and it was one of the things that motivated him to help launch Cross International Catholic Outreach more than five years ago.

"There were several of us who, when we became more aware of the severe poverty overseas, felt compelled to do something to help alleviate the suffering and to provide greater opportunities for the poor," he explained. "We realized that what these people needed was support from the Church and a helping hand to get them started toward a better life. By assisting individual parishes that wanted to develop self-help programs for the people in the slums, we realized we could have an impact that would last. We could support the Church and create long-term, lasting change in the lives of poor families."

In the years since its founding, Cross International Catholic Outreach has created a very effective "self help" program. And because Cross works in partnership with parishes and Catholic ministries already established within impoverished communities, their approach is extremely efficient, making use of existing parish staff members and volunteers so that more of each donated dollar can be used to help the families in need.

"Our method is also very flexible — always allowing the priests, nuns or Catholic leaders who work among the poor to do what is best for their people in a given area at a given time. For example, in one case, a nun wanted to help families leave a dangerous dump where they were scavenging, so we helped her fund a pig-raising project that allowed these people to create a small livestock business and to relocate out of the dump," Cavnar explained. "It was a big success and a huge blessing for the families who were helped."

In the case of Priscilla, the mother from Kenya who dreamed of educating her daughter, help came in the form of a "micro-enterprise loan" — a financial grant given to help a family start a small business. In Priscilla's case, the loan was used to buy dairy goats which are now giving her family undreamed of financial stability. The future is now brighter for her child too. Priscilla should be able to keep her daughter in school and meet all of her other basic needs.

"These and other outreaches to the poor are only possible because American Catholics support Cross International Catholic Outreach. They effectively funded the nun's pig-raising project and allowed us to help Priscilla with a small loan," Cavnar said. "In that way, American Will he grow up as a dump scavenger? American Catholics say "no!" — and offer hope.

Catholics are becoming an important catalyst of change around the globe, impacting hundreds — if not thousands — of lives. Their gifts have helped Cross put into practice the adage: feed a man a fish, feed him for a day; teach a man to fish, feed him for a lifetime.

"Now, families who once lived in constant fear, struggling in survival mode, are forever changed," he added. "They've been given the helping hand they needed... and many are already giving back to their communities, either by volunteering or by sharing the resources they have gained. It's a remarkable testimony to the value of investing in people for the glory of God."

Another amazing thing about this approach is that it costs very little to have an impact — to be, as Cavnar calls it, "a catalyst of change." A few dollars worth of seed can start of a family farm. A pen and a few chickens or rabbits can launch a livestock project. Even the "micro-loans" are typically only a few hundred dollars at most, and those are paid back allowing others in the community to gain the same advantage.

"A man might obtain one of these loans to obtain a bicycle with a sidecar which can be used to transport people for a small fee. Or a woman may buy a small stock of food and household items to sell in a makeshift market stall. Or a couple may buy some fabric and a peddle-power sewing machine to set up a small tailor shop in their home. None of these ideas require a major investment to get up and running, but they yield a living wage to the families who are helped," Cavnar said. "What better gift could a compassionate donor make? With a gift of $50, $100 or $250, you can have a lasting, life-changing impact. And the process is also one that maintains the dignity of the family being helped."

state constitution to define marriage as the union only of a man and woman, it would prohibit other types of unions that imitate marriage, such as civil unions or domestic partnerships.

It also would prohibit legal recognition of same-sex unions performed in other states.

Supporters say North Carolina is the only state south of Washington, D.C., and east of New Mexico without such an amendment.

A rally in support of the amendment is scheduled to take place in Raleigh March 3.

"Throughout the entirety of sacred Scripture, marriage is always and only recognized as a union between a man and a woman."

— Bishop Peter J. Jugis

During the news conference, Bishop Jugis read a statement on behalf of both bishops in support of the proposed amendment. The statement addressed "the theological basis for upholding the traditional understanding of marriage in North Carolina."

"Throughout the entirety of sacred Scripture, marriage is always and only recognized as a union between a man and a woman," said Bishop Jugis. "We believe this understanding of marriage is the only one that should constitutionally exist in our state."

The statement also addressed the issue of homosexual attraction.

"We wish to affirm our church's belief that men and women with a homosexual attraction are children of God possessed of human dignity because they too are created in God's image," said Bishop Jugis.

"Protecting the traditional understanding of marriage is not intended to disparage our brothers and sisters with a homosexual attraction," said the bishop. "Rather, it is intended to affirm a divinely-ordered reality that cannot be changed because it comes from God."

According to the North Carolina constitution, the legislature first must authorize a proposed amendment before it is placed before the citizens of North Carolina for a vote.

Since 2004, bills have been introduced in the state's General Assembly to protect marriage by placing an amendment on the constitution that defines marriage as between a man and a woman. To date, they have been blocked for debate by legislative leaders who claim no amendment is needed because marriage is already limited by state law.

If the recently-introduced bill passes in Raleigh, it would go to voters in November.

Bishops Jugis and Burbidge called on the Catholics of their dioceses, and all who embrace traditional marriage, to join in support of the proposed amendment by contacting their legislators and asking them to help bring it to a vote.

A historical study of Pius XII achieves balance despite some weaknesses

REVIEWED BY EUGENE J. FISHER
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

Since disaffected Catholic journalist John Cornwell published his high-rhetoric, low-research attack on Pope Pius XII, "Hitler's Pope," in 1999, some 20 books, pro and con, have been published on the subject of the pope and the Holocaust.

Only a few of these volumes can be said to be balanced accounts written for the educated lay reader. "A Cross Too Heavy," Paul O'Shea's solid historical study, in the main, falls in that category, though it has its weaknesses.

O'Shea sets Eugenio Pacelli, the man, the diplomat and the pope, within the context of the times that produced him and the time of great evil, World War II, in which he began his papacy.

The former, O'Shea shows, did not equip him well for the latter, though virtually no one, including U.S. President Franklin D. Roosevelt and British Prime Minister Winston Churchill, was able to rise above that tumultuous, insanely violent and almost infinitely complex time to understand fully what was happening to the Jews, much less devise a way to stop it.

One of O'Shea's weaknesses, from this reviewer's point of view, is his presumption that Pope Pius could and should have been able to do both.

But the book's strengths are what should guide the reader to this book, though, again, without accepting uncritically the author's rather negative judgments on Pope Pius.

O'Shea quite rightly eschews the "black-and-white" approach of Cornwell and Daniel Jonah Goldhagen, striving to do justice to the complexity of the central questions — whether the pope did all he could and whether, if he had done more, it would have made a difference.

To his credit O'Shea affirms the many things Pope Pius did to help the Jews and to encourage others to help them, while maintaining the public posture of neutrality that allowed Catholics to work to save Jews.

O'Shea rightly notes that Pope Pius' decision to allow Catholics to determine how they could best help Jews, since they would have to live with the consequences if the Nazis found out, is understandable.

He feels, though, that a more forceful, less diplomatic statement at a crucial time, which he determines to be in the autumn of 1943, would have encouraged many more Catholics to risk their lives for their neighbors. Readers can make up their own minds on this.

The most serious flaw in this book is the author's decision to cut off his considerations in 1943, with the roundup for deportation of more than 1,000 of the Jews of Rome.

Scholars debate the intent and impact of the warning to the Germans by Cardinal Luigi Maglione, Vatican secretary of state, that the pope would not want to have to go public denouncing the roundup.

The Germans took this, O'Shea himself records, as a threat, and stopped the roundups immediately, with the result that the large majority of Rome's Jews were saved.

O'Shea feels the pope should have gone public even though he had stopped the deportations and provided for the Jews of Rome to hide (and so survive) in the church's convents and monasteries.

He does not seem to be aware that food was brought to the sites hiding Jews by trucks owned and operated by the Holy See.

By arbitrarily stopping his study so long before the end of the war, O'Shea is not able to take into account significant deeds such as the saving of tens of thousands of lives quite directly by the papal nuncios in, for example, Budapest and Istanbul.

While we still await a definitive and fully balanced study of Pope Pius and the Jews, this book is at least a worthy beginning toward that end.

Fisher is a retired associate director of the Secretariat of Ecumenical and Interreligious Affairs of the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops.

Trust in God leads to better, lasting life

BY JEAN DENTON
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

The boy — we'll call him Jon — was 12, the second son in a large, impoverished family trying to survive in a war-torn city. The family seemed to have only a pinpoint of possibility for a better life, and that would be to escape the situation.

Get to the United States where there was at least a glimmer of hope.

Jon didn't know how, but his father managed to scrape together documents and enough money to get one family member out of the country. And Jon was it.

His older brother was needed to help provide for the rest of the family at home, while Jon, then on the brink of manhood, was smart, strong and had much promise.

A group of families from their village planned the journey across the ocean, and Jon would travel with them, his father told him. "I didn't want to go. I didn't want to leave my family, and I didn't know any of the people in the group," Jon recalled later.

On the day of departure he hung back, sad and afraid. "But my father said, 'You have to go. You are our only hope for a better life.'"

Jon went. The trip was long, hard and lonely, and when he arrived in the United States, he was met by distant relatives with whom he would live. He went to school and worked with great industriousness and managed to grow up, mostly on his own.

As he became self-sufficient he sent money to his family and after many years was able to bring most of his siblings to this country. Now, two short generations later, the family is increasing and thriving as a significant contributor to its American community.

Jon's father's hope was indeed realized. Like Abraham in this Lenten weekend's first reading, Jon's father put complete trust in God, even giving up his own son, believing God would provide something greater for generations to come.

For a loving father to sacrifice a child calls for such infinite trust.

In the transfiguration of the Gospel our loving God offers us that glimmer of "a better life" and calls us to trust him.

Vatican joins protest over Israeli TV show's satire of Christianity

BY JOHN THAVIS
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

VATICAN CITY — The Vatican protested what it called a “blasphemous” satire of Christianity on an Israeli TV network.

The late-night program broadcast in mid-February included joking suggestions that Mary was impregnated by a school friend at the age of 15 and that Jesus died at a young age because he was fat.

A Vatican statement Feb. 20 said the program had “ridiculed — with blasphemous words and images — the Lord Jesus and the Blessed Virgin Mary.” It expressed support for Christians and Catholic leaders in the Holy Land who had denounced the broadcast.

“Such a vulgar and offensive act of intolerance toward the religious sentiments of believers in Christ must be deplored,” the Vatican statement said.

It noted that the religious figures satirized, Jesus and Mary, were themselves “children of Israel.”

The Vatican said its nuncio in Jerusalem, Archbishop Antonio Franco, had received assurances from the Israeli government that it would take steps to prevent such programs in the future and would try to obtain a public apology from the television network.

In an earlier statement, the Assembly of the Catholic Bishops of the Holy Land condemned the segments, calling them “horrible offenses” and asking the authorities to investigate the incident and “take the necessary actions in order to put an end to such horrible desecration of our faith.”

The bishops said the segments were a symptom of problems plaguing Israeli society such as intolerance, lack of respect and inherent hatred.

“It is unconceivable that such incidents have to occur in Israel, which hosts some of the holiest shrines of Christianity and which relies to a great extent on pilgrimage from Christian countries,” they said. “Such programs have nothing to do with freedom of expression, art and entertainment. They can only work against national integration and harmony in our society.”

A group of Christian lawyers began an online petition urging Pope Benedict XVI not to visit the Holy Land in May.

“The pope should not come to a nation which does not respect Christianity,” said Salim Kubti, a lawyer and chairman of an umbrella organization representing Christian courts.

Lior Shlein, host of the TV show, said the segments were in retaliation for the statements by ultratraditionalist Bishop Richard Williamson of the Society of St. Pius X and other Christian clerics denying the Holocaust.

“If they deny the Holocaust, we will deny Christianity,” Shlein said in a preface to the first segment that depicted Jesus as an obese man who could not have walked on water.

The second segment described Mary as a promiscuous teenager and showed an extremely pregnant woman in pink underwear patting her exposed belly.

The only Christian member of the Israeli parliament, Hana Sweid, then filed a complaint with the legal adviser of the government, charging Shlein with violating an Israeli law that prohibits offending religious sensibilities. Shlein apologized on his Feb. 18 program.

Kubti said the apology was not sufficient and lawyers were waiting to see the reaction to Sweid’s complaint before deciding on their next step. He said they had been approached privately by the television station and Shlein regarding compensation and were negotiating for an educational program or series about Christianity, Islam and Judaism to be aired to promote religious tolerance.

NEW YORK (CNS) — Though geographically the world’s smallest independent city-state — with an area of only 110 acres — Vatican City exerts a spiritual, moral and geopolitical influence far beyond its Lilliputian proportions.

A comprehensive look at this long-established headquarters of the papacy is provided by Polish filmmakers Pawel Pitera and Krzysztof Talczewski’s handsome hourlong documentary, “Discovering Secrets of the Vatican,” distributed by PBS affiliate WTVS in Detroit and airing on PBS stations throughout the network’s March pledge drive (check local listings).

The special ventures to some of the territory’s less frequented areas, such as the 800-year-old Vatican Gardens and the papal printing house, and offers lush images of such highly trafficked sites as St. Peter’s Basilica and the Sistine Chapel. Most interestingly, the program also profiles the day-to-day, behind-the-scenes work of the Vatican’s broadcasters, postal officials and tapestry and art restorers.

The discovery of St. Peter’s tomb — an extraordinary vindication of church tradition that resulted from secret excavations under the basilica begun in 1939 — is chronicled in detail here, as is the colorful history of the Swiss Guard, the papal equivalent of the U.S. Secret Service and the oldest military unit in the world.

Church officials interviewed include U.S. Cardinal Edmund C. Szoka, formerly archbishop of Detroit and more recently head of the Vatican City’s government administration; French Cardinal Jean-Louis Tauran, president of the Pontifical Council for Interreligious Dialogue; and Portuguese Cardinal Jose Saraiva Martins, retired prefect of the Congregation for Saints’ Causes.

A greatly expanded version of the program will be released on a five-DVD set in April. That set includes an interview with Father Michael Collins, author of the recently published tie-in book, “The Vatican: Secrets and Treasures of the Holy City.”

Spiritual exercises foster sanctity at retreat grow in holiness, prayer, virtue and communion with Christ," said Father Patrick Wainwright, a member of Miles Christi.

"You could see that many of the women got to know more about Christ through speaking with him one on one in the Eucharist," he said.

Father Wainwright led the retreat along with Father Richard Castro-Huergo of Miles Christi, a religious order of priests and brothers founded in Argentina in 1984 for the sanctification of the laity, particularly of college students, for the greater glory of God.

The women in attendance were age 16 and older from North Carolina and Virginia.

The retreats are held annually for women in February and for men in June at the Catholic Conference Center.

"A silent retreat is an unusual thing to find, and many might not be sure what to expect," said Father Wainwright. "However, the retreat is guided from the beginning."

Though participants do not speak to one another, there are talks, Mass, eucharistic adoration, time for meditation and spiritual direction with one of the priests.

He said that many people come to the retreats because of the silence that allows for conversation with God.

"Normally, the common trend is that when people come once, they want to come again," Father Wainwright explained.

"We recommend an annual retreat as a spiritual boost to help you persevere year after year. Although we know the Gospel stories, we still need to listen again and to contemplate their meaning in order to live more perfectly," he said.

"The spiritual exercises help everyone in every state in life to increase in faith, virtue ... in a word holiness," said Father Wainwright.

"For young people, the retreat gives a solid foundation to make a good decision for a state in life. It has helped many young people to see God's will and allows men and women to answer God's call" to a religious or priestly vocation, he said.

Miles Christi emphasizes unity within the church and communion with the pope and the bishops of the dioceses they visit around the country and world.

"Bishop (Peter J.) Jugis is very happy with these retreats," Father Wainwright said, regarding a recent meeting with him.

"I spoke to him and he is happy that we are helping the diocese by preaching the spiritual exercises," he said.

Study shows affordability of 'most faithful' Catholic colleges

Belmont Abbey College listed among 22 'economical' schools

BY MARY B. WORTHINGTON
CORRESPONDENT

BELMONT — A new independent report on college costs revealed that some of the "most faithful" U.S. Catholic colleges and universities also offer students significant cost savings.

The study released this month by the Center for the Study of Catholic Higher Education, the research division of the Cardinal Newman Society, confirmed that the Catholic colleges and universities the society recommends in its "The Newman Guide to Choosing a Catholic College" are generally more affordable than other Catholic or all private four-year colleges and universities.

The cost of a degree at the 22 schools in "The Newman Guide" was determined to be an average of $3,000 less than at other Catholic colleges and about $1,000 less than the cost of the average private college.

The list included one school located within the Diocese of Charlotte — Belmont Abbey College.

"The Catholic colleges profiled in 'The Newman Guide' were chosen for their quality education and for the priority that they place on Catholic identity in all aspects of campus life," said Joseph Esposito, editor of "The Newman Guide" and director of the center.

"In that sense, we have always believed that the recommended colleges were 'best buys' for families based on fidelity to Catholic teachings, but with the publication of this affordability study we now know that they are also truly economic 'best buys' too," he said.

The study, "College Affordability and Catholic Identity," was released in order to assist parents with college decisions during financially uncertain times.

"This study is welcome news to families sacrificing to find ways to pay for meaningful Catholic college educations for their sons and daughters," said Patrick Reilly, president of The Cardinal Newman Society.

Other key findings of the study included:

- Colleges recommended by "The Newman Guide" provide students a larger portion of institutional aid (39 percent) than the average private college (29 percent).
- Students at the recommended

Catholic colleges graduate with fewer loans and less debt — on average, about $2,000 less than at private colleges and $1,400 less than other Catholic colleges.

"We often tell students and their parents that Belmont Abbey College offers them rock-solid Catholic values," said Ed Jones, marketing director of Belmont Abbey College.

"This study by the Cardinal Newman Society empirically proves that we do that in more ways than one," he said.

"Hopefully this news ... will help families in the Carolinas and beyond discover a college that has been a 'best-kept secret' in Catholic higher education for too long," he added.

In "The Newman Guide," the following was said of Belmont Abbey College and its president, Dr. William Thierfelder:

"Dr. Thierfelder ... has established his priorities as strengthening the college's Catholic identity, emphasizing its academic credentials and promoting athletic opportunities.

"Some of these enhancements are embodied in one of the more impressive strategic plans that we have seen in our research on Catholic colleges.

"It has three components: Catholic and Benedictine goals, liberal arts programs and efforts to improve overall 'excellence and virtue.'"

Founded in 1993, the Cardinal Newman Society is dedicated to renewing and strengthening Catholic identity at America's 224 Catholic colleges and universities according to Pope John Paul II's document "Ex Cordia Ecclesiae"

Why the rosary is the perfect prayer

Mysteries help us understand, grow with Christ, Mary

A neighbor went to a garage sale, bought a box of kitchen items and found in the box a rosary, clearly handmade. She's not Catholic, so she brought it to me, having seen so many rosaries in my family room.

Then I told her about my rosaries. Most were handmade by the grandkids of my adopted son Sterling, now deceased, and his beautiful wife Bernadette.

Sterling never saw a rosary until as a young teen in 1950 he came to live with me, his new mother.

In a way, the rosary never left Sterling's hands. He and Bernie, devout Catholics, parents of seven and grandparents of 15, never went to bed without praying the rosary. Bernie taught several of their grandchildren to make the rosaries I have.

My devotion to the rosary took root when I was a student at the College of St. Rose in Albany, N.Y., in the late 1940s. My classmates and I were greatly influenced by a marvelous priest in residence at our college, Father Patrick Peyton of the Congregation of the Holy Cross.

He was well-known then as the "rosary priest," and he strongly communicated his love for the rosary to us in his Irish brogue. We especially liked to hear about the movie stars he had inspired to say the rosary!

The day my neighbor brought me the discarded rosary I learned that noted Catholic author Mitch Finley had written a book called "The Rosary Handbook: A Guide for Newcomers, Old-Timers and Those in Between."

I keep telling others about this upbeat and easy-to-understand book.

Finley, the recipient of six Catholic Press Association awards and an excellence in writing award from the American Society of Journalists and Authors, sheds light on a question I am asked occasionally: Why do Catholics refer to the "mysteries" of the rosary?

He says the term "mystery" is "correctly defined as 'a religious truth that one can know only by revelation and cannot fully understand.'"

Finley also points out that the rosary focuses on what theologians call the "Christ event." Central to this is Jesus' mother, Mary. Rather astonishingly, Finley convincingly affirms that the rosary is a feminist prayer.

"The rosary steepens a man's heart and soul in the feminine dignity and presence of the woman Mary," he explains. "Thus, men who pray the rosary with understanding grow to respect and honor all women more."

The Bottom Line

A Bosnian woman holds her rosary during Christmas morning prayers at the Sarajevo cathedral Dec. 25, 2008.

I was most moved by Finley's thoughts on the sorrowful mysteries that help us see in the passion of Christ "the extent to which Jesus went in order to fully embrace the experience of being human. ... He had to abandon himself to his unavoidable fate and trust that God's love was trustworthy. And that's exactly what we must do as well."

In the final chapter of this beautiful book, Finley speaks of the luminous mysteries, added by Pope John Paul II in 2002, to emphasize that Jesus is the light of the world.

Finley singles out Jesus' baptism, his self-manifestation at the wedding at Cana, his proclaiming that the kingdom of God had come, his transfiguration and institution of the Eucharist.

"The addition of these 'new' rosary mysteries brings a more complete balance to the rosary and a more complete awareness of the public ministry of Jesus to those who pray the rosary," Finley says.

As for me, I believe if you read this book you'll think of the rosary in a new way. Once again it will be a key opening a doorway into the presence of God.

To parents in pain

Parents of children outside the faith should not despair

In the 1970s a Senate juvenile delinquency subcommittee surveyed 750 public school districts and reported the following changes:

School dropouts increased by 11 percent, drug and alcohol offenses on school property increased by 37 percent, burglaries of school buildings increased by 11 percent and assaults on teachers increased by 77 percent.

On the academic level, reading scores were down substantially, thus revealing an intellectual impoverishment that continued to spiral downward.

In the subsequent 40 years those statistics have become, unfortunately, progressively worse.

By comparison, the Catholic school system, which teaches spiritual values, has performed much better.

The nuns, whose vision, intellectual drive and personal commitment to excellence benefited a whole generation of baby boomers, took a lot of ribbing over the years from their students who put them down for their strict rules and old-fashioned ways.

Even so, these self-sacrificing women managed to produce a rich legacy of honorable graduates who in turn have become responsible parents and grandparents.

What of the Catholic parents who lament the fact that some of their youngsters have fallen away from their faith?

In today's mixed-up world, this is not too surprising. I do not judge them. I simply advise them not to put down themselves or their children.

For the most part, they did a good job protecting their children from the pervasive drug subculture and so many other damaging distractions.

Compared to having a juvenile delinquent on their hands, this disappointment pales in comparison.

I am proud of those parents who tried so hard to do their best for their children. And yes, I am also proud of the Catholic school system for teaching the words of Jesus, "Seek first the kingdom (of God) and his righteousness, and all these things will be given you besides" (Mt 6:33).

Recently I saw the movie "A River Runs Through It" for the second time. Brad Pitt plays the son of a Protestant minister who instructed him well in the faith.

But the boy has a flare for dangerous risk-taking, calling the other boys "chicken" if they don't follow him in one reckless prank after another.

As he gets older, he begins defying the wisdom of his father by drinking and gambling.

Then the dreaded day comes when his parents receive news that their beloved son was beaten to death in a local bar.

At the funeral, his father holds back tears as he tries to preach the eulogy.

He manages to make the point that sometimes parents are unable to help those who are dearest to them.

Shaking his head sadly, he adds, "It seems the ones who need the most help refuse that help when it is offered to them."

How many good parents and grandparents have experienced this same kind of sorrow?

My heart goes out to all of you, especially those of you who have children who do not practice their faith.

You have given so much for your children.

Oftentimes you were rewarded with ingratitude and grief. But do not be disheartened. God is merciful!

Forgive yourself for not being a perfect human being. You did your best.

Remember, the Lord loves you and your children. Trust him and all will be well.

Ten things to do before Easter Sunday

Lent is about focusing on what matters, trimming away what doesn't

It can be hard when Lent seems like something added to your to-do list (or a lot of somethings!). If you're a parent, your everyday list is long.

So what do you bump or put on hold or admit to yourself you're never going to accomplish until the kids grow up and move away?

On the other hand, if you don't bump, put or admit, then Lent can be like any other time of the year, and that would be a shame. Not "shame on you," but a shame your family — and you — missed this opportunity.

It's good for your children to know, it's good for their parents to remember, that sacrificing is possible. More than a few families, no doubt including some in your parish, are already making a number of sacrifice this Lent and beyond because of current economic conditions.

They're cutting way back and doing without because they have no other choice.

Lent is about choice. About many choices. About, time and again, deciding to do something more or not to do something you customarily like to do.

And Lent is about focusing. It's looking at what really matters and trimming away what doesn't.

If you'd like some ideas of what you can do from Ash Wednesday through Holy Saturday, here are some suggestions:

1. Donate to the local food bank. These wonderful organizations have been under a lot of stress lately as they try to help more and more families.

Can't get over there with a bag of groceries? Send a check. Or go online. Many have ways to donate that way too.

2. As a family, read one complete Gospel. Yes, the first three (Matthew, Mark and Luke) are similar — synoptic — but each of them and John is unique.

3. Quit smoking. Yikes, that's a hard one, isn't it? A true sacrifice.

Not a smoker? Pray for those who are quitting. Pray for those who are suffering health problems related to smoking.

4. Get to at least one weekday Mass every week.

5. Learn to weave palms. A number of Web sites offer directions,

Your Family

MONICA

including www.italiansrus.com/palms/palmpatterns.htm.

6. Post a prayer request list on the refrigerator. It's an easy way to remind yourself that "I'll pray for you" is a promise that matters. It's an easy way to teach your children how to become people who make those promises.

7. Learn a new recipe for fish. All those meatless Fridays offer the family a chance to try something new. A vegetarian menu could be a good choice.

In either case, in keeping with the spirit of Lent, keep it simple.

8. Ask forgiveness from someone you've hurt. Forgive someone who has hurt you. What a difference either can make.

9. Thank God for the gifts of faith, hope and love.

10. Hug your children and kiss your spouse!

The honeymoon is over

The Human Side

FATHER EUGENE
HEMRICK
CNS COLUMNIST

It seems like only yesterday that the United States was singing the praises of Barack Obama and hope filled the air. But a few weeks into his presidency some speculate that the honeymoon is over.

To know how true this is, all we need to do is listen to the nightly news. Republicans complain they are not being consulted, some Democrats aren't happy about the incentives and bailouts, and prominent candidates for Obama's cabinet have been scrubbed and campaign promises are being cautiously modified.

Why do honeymoons last but moments? A honeymoon is usually a time of awesome bliss. One of the definitions of "bliss" in Webster's dictionary is "heavenly joy."

When we think of heaven, we think of God, who is perfect, and saints, who tried to live as perfectly as possible.

One reason earthly joy dies out so quickly is because we are imperfect. We know it is right to be humble, but pride gets in the way. Kindness should be our trademark, but it is so easy to become ill-disposed.

We mouth the national saying — "in unity there is strength" — but more often than not we sow disunity, dissension and disaffection.

Another reason honeymoons don't last can be traced back to Christ. At first he is a welcomed hero and consoler. Wherever he goes, crowds follow, hoping to be cured and to receive favors.

After their courtship, marriage ceremony and honeymoon, young couples wake up one morning, realizing they need to face up to some of their selfish needs. Even though they pledged to love each other, they, like all honeymooners, need to readjust their standards. Marriage is a 50-50 proposition.

Yet another reason honeymoons are short-lived is because they raise the bar of hope and expectations too high, and the old saying "what goes up must come down" is ever so true.

In this world, it is unreasonable to expect a honeymoon to last long. Shangri-La is wonderful to contemplate and experience, but in reality idyllic vacations are short and work hours are long.

Just because honeymoons are short-lived there is no reason to dismiss them as unreal. They raise our hope and spirits and bless us with joyful memories. They are like a good, wholesome meal we need to bolster us every so often.

Even though the present honeymoon of Obama seems over, other honeymoons will come, and with each one we will be reminded that God endowed us with a beautiful desire to experience heaven on earth in anticipation of the real heaven.

Help for the unemployed

Christian principles can help overcome economic hardships

In the current economic crisis, hundreds of thousands of people at all levels of the corporate ladder have found themselves unemployed. More will undoubtedly follow in the months ahead.

Besides economic hardship, these workers are also experiencing a profound lifestyle change that, if not managed carefully, can put them at risk for developing health and emotional problems, even depression and a sense of worthlessness.

It is very natural to equate worth, skill and productivity with a job. But in reality our value is much more than a paycheck. It transcends the traditional concept of the workplace.

As Christians, we know that the Lord values each of us as precious children, and our workplace is, in truth, the world.

But how can we build upon this knowledge when there is seemingly no immediate, easy solution to daily needs and stresses? By putting Christian principles into practice.

Face reality. Now is not the time to hide under the proverbial covers! Make sure that you are doing all you can to keep afloat financially.

Apply for unemployment, determine health insurance possibilities, analyze daily expenses and cut costs where possible, put off unnecessary purchases and communicate with creditors to minimize financial stress.

Keep busy. A new job will not usually fall from the sky.

Although there is no work schedule to keep an unemployed person busy, there is still plenty to do: assessing job prospects, networking with referrals given by friends and family, preparing a resume and list of references.

Make a list of things to do and try to accomplish at least three of them each day.

Pray and assess. Perhaps you had the perfect job. Perhaps you thought you did, but you really didn't. Being unemployed allows you unhurried time to pray for God's guidance and wisdom.

Take a sober, objective view of your talents and training. Listen for God's whisper urging you to go his way.

Look upon this time as a spiritual and personal adventure, one that will contain good insight and surprises.

Maintain relationships. When we face a crisis, we need others to support us, and we need to support them too.

Avoid feelings of jealousy toward those who are still employed. Focus instead on being a good friend, a strong encourager, a brother or sister in Christ.

Consider volunteering. No matter how dire your circumstances, there is always someone in greater need.

Through your parish, local schools, shelters or other organizations, there are opportunities for volunteering that will allow you to reach out to others and put your skills to work.

Tend to health. If you've ever used having to work as an excuse not to exercise, now's your chance! Set up a fitness schedule and stick to it. Prepare healthy meals. Allow your vitality to flow into other aspects of your life, especially your job search.

Seek help. The stresses stemming from being unemployed can lead to emotional and physical problems, including depression. These are nothing to be ashamed of, and they can be helped.

If you sense that the stress is becoming too much, seek help through your pastor, church family, physician or a trusted family member. Problems can look darkest when we keep them bottled inside.

In Romans 8:28, St. Paul writes: "We know that all things work for good for those who love God, who are called according to his purpose."

As scary as being unemployed can be, in faith we know that God is good, he calls us and we can draw strength from his purpose for our lives even in these troubled times.

Physicians take legal, educational steps to defend conscience rights

BY NANCY FRAZIER O'BRIEN
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

WASHINGTON — To combat what they see as threats to the conscience rights of health care professionals who oppose abortion, the Catholic Medical Association and other organizations are taking both legal and educational steps.

The Philadelphia-based Catholic Medical Association, which has some 1,100 members nationwide, has joined with the Christian Medical Association and the American Association of Pro-Life Obstetricians and Gynecologists in an effort to intervene legally against lawsuits filed by the attorneys general of eight states, Planned Parenthood of America and the National Family Planning and Reproductive Health Association.

The suits seek to overturn a Department of Health and Human Services regulation that codifies several existing federal statutes prohibiting discrimination against health professionals who decline to participate in abortions or other medical procedures because of their religious or other moral objections.

Without the regulation, members of the three groups would be subject to "the imminent threat of being forced ... to perform abortions, assist in abortions, train for abortions and refer individuals for abortions despite their religious, moral and ethical objections to the practice of abortion," said court papers filed with the U.S. District Court in Hartford, Conn.

Attorneys from the Alliance Defense Fund and the Center for Law & Religious Freedom filed the motions on behalf of the three pro-life organizations.

"Physicians must defend their right to practice medicine in accordance with their conscience," said John Brehany, executive director of the Catholic Medical Association. "It's a very important principle that every physician should support."

Without conscience protections, for example, physicians or other health care professionals could be subject to government conscription to participate in the executions of death-row prisoners if the state could not find volunteers to do so, Brehany said.

The current lawsuits support the "notion that a court can demand (health care professionals) perform actions they believe to be evil," he added. "That's getting lost in the heated rhetoric" surrounding the abortion issue.

The motions to intervene argue that pro-life medical professionals could be "forced to relocate to jurisdictions that respect their rights or to leave the profession altogether" if there were no laws protecting their conscience rights.

The motions also criticize the "plaintiffs' baseless allegations that medical professionals exercising their conscience place women at risk of serious injury and even death by failing to render necessary services during medical emergencies."

The three pro-life groups "should be permitted to intervene to respond to these allegations and fully develop the factual record concerning the exercise of conscience by medical professionals," the motions add.

"I'm confident that the court will allow these doctors to intervene because they are the ones who will be forced" to perform or refer or train for abortions, said Bowman. "It's a direct attack on the only existing protections" for pro-life health professionals.

"When they try to strike down a regulation that implements laws in place for 30 years," Bowman said, "it affects every pro-life health professional."

But in addition to the legal actions, Brehany hopes members of the Catholic Medical Association will get involved personally in defending conscience rights by making the case before their local medical societies, through letters to the editor and in peer-to-peer contacts.

The association is preparing materials to help its members make its case in the various forums.

People need to know that even if the HHS regulation were to be overturned, "there are still laws that protect conscience rights," Brehany said. "We need to continue to defend and respect and explain the reasoning behind them."

Deirdre McQuade, assistant director for policy and communications in the U.S. bishops' Secretariat of Pro-Life Activities, said conscience protection is "not something that Catholics are the only ones calling for."

"It is a matter of basic human and civil rights," she added. "You don't have to be religious to be against involvement with abortion."

McQuade noted that the Hippocratic oath, through which physicians pledge to "do no harm," originally included a promise to "offer no abortifacient."

"Those who are faithful to the letter and the spirit of the Hippocratic oath don't perform abortions," she said.

WASHINGTON — U.S. Jewish and Catholic leaders Feb. 26 hashed out differences on issues ranging from the controversial sainthood cause of Pope Pius XII to Pope Benedict XVI's lifting of the excommunication of a British-born traditionalist bishop who claims the Holocaust was exaggerated.

The gathering of the religious leaders at the Pope John Paul II Cultural Center in Washington was the start of what was being called a broad and permanent dialogue between the two religions.

BUILDING SOLIDARITY AND SOCIETY

Volunteer Ben Slyn sorts cans of donated food at the Catholic Charities food resource center in downtown San Diego Feb. 26. Speakers at a Feb. 27 summit in New York said they see the current economic crisis as an opportunity for volunteerism.

Summit attendees see economic crisis as opportunity for volunteerism

NEW YORK (CNS) — The current economic crisis is an opportunity for volunteers from all sectors of the American public to work together to help their neighbors in need and even plant the seed for a national movement.

That was the view of participants at "A Nation of Neighbors Helping Neighbors: A Summit on Volunteerism as a Response to the Economic Crisis" sponsored Feb. 27 in New York by the Knights of Columbus and Fairfield University.

"More people are hurting and there are fewer dollars to help those in need," said Carl Anderson, supreme knight of the Knights of Columbus.

"Charitable endowments have taken a crushing blow, but there are still 24 hours in a day and seven days in a week," he added, so people may be able to volunteer their time even if they cannot make financial contributions.

"Volunteerism builds solidarity with the people you're helping and contributes to a more humane society," he said.

The summit drew 185 participants from more than 115 organizations representing government, corporate, secular, Catholic and other religious groups from across the United States.

Jesuit Father Richard Ryscavage, director of the Center for Faith and Public Life at Jesuit-run Fairfield University in Connecticut, told Catholic News Service that nonprofit organizations are not well-known or appreciated by the government.

"People don't know that Catholic social services take a huge burden off the government and that many government programs are dependent on them. Washington doesn't understand this," he said.

"We want nonprofit organizations to have their voices heard" as the Congress considers renewing the National Community Service Act of 1990, he said.

That legislation established the Corporation for National and Community Services to support and encourage volunteering and community service.

According to the Independent Sector, the value of volunteer time is $19.51 an hour.

Anderson said the range and number of summit participants "is further proof of the deep concern we have as a nation for our neighbor, and shows the very best of cooperation."

He challenged each sector represented to expand its use and understanding of volunteers. He urged government officials not to "reinvent the wheel" but to draw on the "hundreds of years of experience" of the volunteer organizations.

Anderson said if more corporations reached out to their communities through volunteer programs "they would be more disposed to the common good in their thinking than just profits. They would look at customers as neighbors and not just abstractions."

Anderson said churches and synagogues should bring volunteer opportunities to the people in their pews.

"People will be more likely to volunteer if they are approached through their church and they know that the people they prayed with Saturday or Sunday will be the people they will be serving their community with later in the week," he said.

He told CNS that Catholic groups have a leadership role in the form of witness and service.

"If we do those two things right, we provide a kind of example people can follow," he said.

Catholic governor criticized by archbishop nominated as HHS secretary

WASHINGTON (CNS) — A Catholic governor whose archbishop has told her not to receive Communion until she changes her stand on abortion is President Barack Obama's latest choice for secretary of the Department of Health and Human Services.

The nomination of Gov. Kathleen Sebelius as HHS secretary was announced March 2 at the White House. Sebelius has been governor of Kansas since 2003.

Sebelius has drawn strong criticism from Archbishop Joseph F. Naumann of Kansas City, Kan., who said in 2008 that she should not present herself for Communion until she publicly repudiates her support for abortion.

The archbishop said his decision was not based only on her April 2008 veto of the Comprehensive Abortion Reform Act, which would have placed new requirements on abortion providers, but on "a 30-year history of advocating and acting in support of legalized abortion."

In a 2008 column about the governor,

Archbishop Naumann said that as a state representative Sebelius "voted to weaken or eliminate even such modest measures as parental notification for teens, waiting periods or informed-consent protections for women before an abortion."

In April 2007, in an event at the governor's mansion, she honored Dr. George Tiller, known for performing late-term abortions in Wichita, Kan., and Dr. LeRoy Carhart, a Nebraska abortion doctor. Tiller faces trial beginning March 16 on 19 counts of performing illegal late-term abortions.

Sebelius also clashed with the Kansas bishops on the issue of embryonic stem-cell research, when she praised the move by voters in Missouri to forbid any action by the state Legislature to regulate or limit embryonic stem-cell research.

A group called Catholics for Sebelius has launched a Web site touting the governor's Catholic background and her actions in support of "the common good."

Pope highlights importance of angels, offers prayers for jobs

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Shortly before beginning his annual Lenten retreat, Pope Benedict XVI encouraged Catholics to invoke the protection of angels and he exhorted politicians and business leaders to give priority to saving jobs as they face the global economic crisis.

Reciting the Angelus March 1 with visitors in St. Peter's Square, the pope spoke about the day's Gospel story about Jesus being tempted in the desert.

But instead of highlighting Satan's efforts to trick Jesus, he focused on the line that says the angels served Jesus during his 40 days in the desert.

Throughout the Bible, he said, angels, "luminous and mysterious figures," are sent in the name of God to help and to guide people, showing them the path to safety and proclaiming good news to them.

"Dear brothers and sisters, we cut out a significant part of the Gospel if we set aside these beings sent by God to announce his presence among us," the pope said.

"Let us invoke them often so that they would support us in our commitment to following Jesus," the pope said.

Pope Benedict also prayed that the angels "would watch over me and my collaborators" during their weeklong Lenten retreat at the Vatican.

In addition to entrusting workers to the protection of St. Joseph, patron of workers, the pope said, "I want to express my encouragement to both political and civil authorities as well as to business leaders so that with the cooperation of everyone this delicate moment can be faced."

"A common and strong commitment is needed" to overcome the economic crisis, "remembering that priority must be given to workers and their families," Pope Benedict said.

All Catholics are invited to attend this free event to learn more about the diverse and universal nature of the Catholic Church. The next meeting will be March 21 on the topic, "Manifestation of God's Love: Economy." Meetings will take place in the fellowship hall after Divine Liturgy at 6 p.m.

Number of priests showing steady, moderate increase, Vatican says

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — The latest church statistics show that the number of priests and seminarians around the world has been showing a modest, yet steady increase.

The statistics from the end of 2007 also showed that the number of Catholics remains stable at 1.147 billion people across the globe.

The sampling of statistics was released Feb. 28 in connection with the presentation of the 2009 edition of the Vatican yearbook, known as the Annuario Pontificio, which catalogs the church's presence in each diocese.

The Vatican said the global Catholic population increased during 2007 by 1.4 percent, which more or less kept pace with the 1.1 percent global birthrate that year.

For the past two years, Catholics have made up 17.3 percent of the world's population, it said.

The number of priests in the world also rose, but just by 0.18 percent. At the end of 2007 there were 408,024 priests in the world, 762 more than at the beginning of the year.

The figure on the number of priests was showing a continued "trend of moderate growth which began in 2000 after more than 20 years of disappointing results," the Vatican report said.

However, that growth has been confined to Africa and Asia, which showed substantial increases in ordinations with 27.6 percent growth and 21.1 percent growth, respectively, it said.

The number of priests has remained more or less the same in the Americas, while Europe registered a 6.8 percent decline and Oceania reported a 5.5 percent decrease in the total number of priests since 2000, said the Vatican.

The number of seminarians increased by 0.4 percent in 2007. At the end of the year, there were 115,919 seminarians.

However, only Africa and Asia saw significant growth in priestly vocations, while numbers fell by 2.1 percent in Europe and by 1 percent in the Americas, the Vatican said.

The report said the number of permanent deacons continued to show significant growth. There were 35,942 deacons at the end of 2007 — an increase of 4.1 percent over the previous year, it said.

Federal appeals court upholds ruling Vatican can be sued over abuse

SAN FRANCISCO (CNS) — The 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in San Francisco March 3 upheld a 2006 lower court ruling that the Vatican is not entitled to sovereign immunity from a clergy sex abuse lawsuit that named it as a defendant.

But it narrowed the extent of that ruling by remanding the case to the lower court "for further proceedings" before the suit against the Vatican can go forward.

A three-judge panel of the 9th Circuit issued the decision on a June 7, 2006, ruling by U.S. District Judge Michael W.

Mosman in Portland, Ore.

The case before the court, John V. Doe v. Holy See, was first filed in Portland in April 2002.

It involves claims that the victim, identified only as John V. Doe, was sexually abused in Portland in 1965 or 1966, at the age of 15 or 16, by Servite Father Andrew Ronan, who was then stationed at his order's Sanctuary of Our Sorrowful Mother in Portland.

He was laicized in 1966 and allegedly had previously admitted to sexually abusing children at earlier postings in Ireland and in Chicago. He died in 1992.

Fighting FOCA

Catholics take part in national pro-life postcard campaign

KERNERSVILLE — Catholics in Kernersville recently voiced their opposition to potential Congressional action to reverse current pro-life policies.

The parish Respect Life Committee and Columbiettes Council 8509 jointly conducted a "Fight FOCA" postcard campaign at Holy Cross Church in Kernersville Jan. 24-25.

The national postcard campaign, launched Jan. 24-25, asked members of Congress to oppose the Freedom of Choice Act (FOCA), or any measures similar to it. FOCA would revoke most pro-life laws at the state and federal levels.

While FOCA has not yet been introduced in the 111th Congress, "this legislation is extremely dangerous," said Maggie Nadol, director of Respect Life, a program of Catholic Social Services of the Diocese of Charlotte.

The diocesan Respect Life ministry helped distribute the postcards and instructional packets to parishes throughout the diocese.

A majority of U.S. dioceses participated in the recent postcard campaign, according to a Feb. 4 news release from the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops.

Through its partner organization, the National Committee for a Human Life Amendment, the USCCB has been sponsoring national postcard campaigns related to various pro-life causes since 1993.

The original campaign, held at the start of President Bill Clinton's first term in office, also targeted the Freedom of Choice Act.

"The response at Holy Cross Church in Kernersville was overwhelming," said Melanie Feeney-Lewis, a member of the Columbiettes.

The effort at Holy Cross Church resulted in 1,500 postcards being mailed to North Carolina's members of Congress. Postcards also were delivered to Rep. Virginia Foxx's Clemson office Jan. 28.

Respect Life is funded in part through contributions to the Diocesan Support Appeal. This year's DSA runs Feb. 1 through March 8.

CHARLOTTE — Parishioners of St. Gabriel Church have a new outdoor area for prayer, meditation and reflection.

Father Frank O'Rourke, pastor, blessed the Guardian Angel Memorial Garden on the church property during a candlelit ceremony Feb. 27.

The garden began as an Eagle rank project by David Roux and Jeffrey Melando, members of Boy Scout Troop 174 at St. Gabriel Church.

The garden includes a stone path, benches, a guardian angel statue and Stations of the Cross.

Some of the memorial garden's donors are parents who have lost children.

"It provides a quiet meditation area for bereaved parents" and is open to all for quiet reflection and prayer, said Claudia Putnam, parish business manager.

What's The Road Like Ahead?

Catholic church in her town, she admits that she knew little about Catholicism.

"I would often see the nuns, dressed in their habits, walking to the Catholic school," said Buckley. "I considered them to be very holy, although I knew nothing about the Catholic faith."

When Buckley was 15, she went with a friend and her family to the beach at the Outer Banks for Mother's Day weekend.

"It was the first Mother's Day I had ever spent away from my mother and I knew that saddened her," said Buckley. "But I was too excited to think about that; all I could think about was myself."

A storm had recently hit the Outer Banks, leaving many of the houses demolished.

While Buckley and her friend were searching through scattered debris in the sand dunes, something shiny caught her eye. She thought it was a charm.

"I picked it up, looked at it and although it had an inscription on it, it didn't make any sense to me so I just put it in my pocket," said Buckley. "My mother later told me that she thought it was something Catholic."

A charming journey

During the next 30 years, Buckley turned away from her relationship with God.

She sought happiness from material things, a practice that left her feeling empty and unsatisfied.

"One night when I was at my lowest point, I fell on my knees and prayed for the first time in many years," she said. "'Lord,' I said, 'I can't handle my life anymore; I want you to take over my life.'"

That marked a turning point in her life.

"The next morning I awoke a brand new person," she said. "I couldn't stop talking about Jesus."

Buckley started reading the Bible and other religious books.

"I went through these books like a starving person, devouring every word," she said. "Yet I never realized that all the books I was reading were Catholic."

In one book, Buckley recalled reading about a miraculous medal.

"I was thoroughly intrigued and determined to get myself one of these amazing medals," she said.

But before she went to a Catholic bookstore in search of the medal, she had a realization.

"I glanced over at all the books I'd recently been reading. All of a sudden the thought came into my head, 'all these books are Catholic,'" she said.

Buckley thought that perhaps God was trying to send her the message that she should become Catholic.

"If that's what you want Lord, please make it very clear to me," she said. "'Have someone say to me, 'Would you like to become Catholic?' and then I'll know for sure that is what you want.'"

When Buckley arrived at the Catholic bookstore, she realized she had no idea what a miraculous medal looked like.

She explained to the saleswoman that she wasn't Catholic and asked for assistance. The saleswoman asked her if she would be interested in RCIA (Rite of Christian Initiation for Adults). Not knowing what that was, Buckley explained to the woman that she wasn't sure.

"Oh," she said, "I'm sorry. What I'm trying to say is, would you like to become Catholic?"

Buckley was amazed.

"Just twenty minutes ago I had asked the Lord if he wanted me to be Catholic, to have someone say those exact words to me," she said.

The next day, Buckley began RCIA at St. Ann Church in Charlotte. She was confirmed at the Easter Vigil in 1994.

"The day I was confirmed was one of the happiest days of my life," said Buckley. "I felt like a new bride."

"Three years after entering the church, I was on the phone talking to a friend about my conversion when I remembered finding that Catholic 'charm' on the sand dune 33 years earlier," said Buckley.

When she found the "charm" still in her jewelry box, she realized it was a miraculous medal.

When Buckley looked back on that Mother's Day weekend and her trip to the Outer Banks, she thought about how she had chosen to go on the trip despite her mother's wishes.

"I had forsaken my mother on Mother's Day to pursue my own selfish interest, but my heavenly mother had not forsaken me."

"I believe God sent her on that Mother's Day and that she has been with me throughout all these years, gently guiding me back to him," she said. "It took 30 years and many wrong turns but, thanks be to God, I'm finally home."

Growing in faith

Buckley launched Catholic Scripture Study in August 2003.

For that first session there were about 60 classes nationwide. Now there are approximately 15,000 participants in more than 40 countries.

The mission of Catholic Scripture Study International is to bring people closer to Jesus Christ and his church through in-depth Scripture study.

The program strives to help Catholics grow in knowledge of their faith by providing user-friendly materials, ongoing one-on-one support, and comprehensive online resources.

During the past six years, Buckley has continued to grow in her faith.

"Jesus is the center of my life and everything revolves around him and his church," she said. "I feel extremely blessed to be able to serve him through the mission of Catholic Scripture Study."

"I tell everyone this is his program, not mine," said Buckley. "He's just allowing me to be the steward of it and I pray that he will continue to use me as long as I am on this earth."

Exploring God's creation

After 150 years, evolution debate continues among people of faith

BY DENNIS SADOWSKI
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

WASHINGTON — As scientists, theologians and philosophers gathered March 3-7 in Rome for a Vatican-sponsored congress marking the 150th anniversary of the publication of Charles Darwin's theory on evolution, they hoped to help Catholic Church officials better understand some of the current thought and research related to evolutionary biology.

"The program is to reorient the conversation between the Catholic Church and modern natural science, to get a new kind of conversation going," explained Phillip Sloan, professor of liberal studies at the University of Notre Dame in Indiana and a congress planner. "It's establishing a dialogue on science and theology because of the great challenges that modern sciences are presenting to traditional theological understanding," he said.

Sponsored by the Pontifical Council for Culture under its Science, Technology and the Ontological Quest project, the University of Notre Dame and several of Rome's pontifical universities, the gathering of international scholars and Vatican officials was one of a series of events surrounding the publication of Darwin's landmark work.

Darwin's theory, which several popes have accepted as compatible with Catholic teaching, remains a contentious topic in the United States. The arguments have focused on whether the Genesis story of creation should hold the same stature as evolution in the classroom.

The discussion has taken on an added dimension with the growing movement to promote intelligent design, which accepts that life has evolved over the eons but that because it is so complex its development has been guided by a supreme being or intelligent agent, which some identify as God.

Sloan said that how society sees evolution has been shaped by the popular media, which omits any role for God in creation. Without God somewhere in the equation, it becomes a lot easier for people of faith to reject Darwin's premise about the existence of life.

A Gallup Poll released Feb. 12, the 200th anniversary of Darwin's birth, showed that 39 percent of Americans accept evolutionary theory while 25 percent do not. Another 36 percent of respondents had no opinion.

Catholic support

Popes Pius XII, John Paul II and Benedict XVI in particular have expressed interest in biological evolution. Pope Pius XII wrote in a 1950 encyclical that there was no conflict between evolution and faith, as long as there were certain firm points of faith where no concession can be made.

More than half a century later Pope John Paul II cited the encyclical in offering firm support for Darwin's work, telling the Pontifical Academy of Sciences in 1996 that "new knowledge leads to recognition of the theory of evolution as more than a hypothesis."

Despite such public support, Catholics have a shallow understanding of the issues that Darwin's theory raises, Sloan explained in announcing the congress in September 2008.

Sloan told Catholic News Service the conference will be a step toward helping interject Catholics into the discussion, but with a focus on the nature of human existence. People of faith do not have to be backed into a corner, forced to choose one or the other, leading Catholic proponents of evolution told CNS.

Martinez-Hewlett, professor emeritus of molecular and cellular biology at the University of Arizona, said Christians, and Catholics in particular, would benefit from greater education about evolution and faith. He suggested such efforts should not just be focused in classrooms but from pulpits as well.

Hewlett, a lay Dominican who teaches courses on science and religion at the Center for Theology and the Natural Sciences at the Graduate Theological Union in Berkeley, Calif., accepts the science of biological evolution because "it is good science" and offers the best explanation for the observations about how life developed on earth.

"Science by itself doesn't say anything about our spiritual nature, about us as children of God. We need to help folks understand that the evolutionary model is a very rich paradigm that gives us all of our biology, and implicitly our medicine, with all of the things it can do for us," he said. "However the science of evolution doesn't contain any of the anti-religious things that some people claim."

Biologist Kenneth Miller, a leading science educator at Brown University in Rhode Island and a popular lecturer, holds firm to the theory of evolution as explaining how life, including complex life, developed on earth.

As a lifelong Catholic, Miller said his faith and his profession hardly are contradictory. "Look at what evolution tells us," he said. "We live on a planet and in a universe where the very laws of nature are remarkably hospitable to the emergence of new life. We as human beings are part of that natural fabric."

"Evolution is a way to understand the wisdom of the creative power of God. God is a lot more clever than we generally give him credit for," he said.

And Sandra Yocum, chairwoman of the religious studies department at the University of Dayton, in Ohio, said understanding evolution "helps us with our understanding of who God is, to understand that God is more mysterious than we recognize."

Complex matters

While Darwinian evolution has its shortcomings, it remains the most plausible theory of how the world got to where it is today in the mind of Miller's friend, John Haught, senior fellow in science and religion at the Woodstock Theological Center at Georgetown University in Washington.

Haught, who has written several books on theology and evolution, told CNS that some objections to evolution remain because many of its supporters have adopted a materialistic view of the world. That view holds that matter — nothing more — is all there is in the world.

Rather, Haught outlined a view of creation that is much more dynamic, in which he describes God as being "more interested in adventure" than in "maintaining the status quo," leading to the creation of beauty, diversity and enjoyment. "Evolution occurs because God wants to maximize freedom," Haught said. "Any universe that gives rise to free beings like ourselves, it has to be something other than perfectly designed."

"Everything would be fixed in its place forever; no wiggle room, no freedom, no future, no room for hope, no room for action, no room for the emergence of virtue, no room for religious aspiration," he said.

Many religious fundamentalists adhere to the creation story in Genesis and believe God created the world and humans in their present form 6,000 to 10,000 years ago. A second premise, known as intelligent design, has emerged over the last three decades. While its critics maintain that intelligent design is a repackaged version of creationism, its supporters say it has its foundation in science.

Leading intelligent design promoter Michael J. Behe, a Catholic and a biochemist at Lehigh University in Pennsylvania, told CNS that life is too complex to have evolved on its own.

"Darwin's theory works great if you've got some system working well already and can improve it by some excruciatingly tiny steps," Behe said. "I think evolution is guided or set up or rigged somehow to produce what it has produced. Intelligent design is not a religious conclusion; it's an empirical conclusion. We didn't expect this machinery in the cell and we didn't expect the foundation of life to be so complicated. Now that it is, we have to come up with the best explanation for it."

Behe is among a small number of scientists who support intelligent design and as a result has been pushed to the margins of modern scientific research.

On the other side of the argument, a growing number of scientists are using evolutionary theory to justify no belief in God. One of the most vocal has been author Richard Dawkins, a British scientist whose best-selling books have challenged anyone who believes that God has any role in creation whatsoever.

Just as he defends evolution from its opponents, Miller, the Brown University biologist, often is called upon to defend his belief in God.

Nonbelieving and agnostic colleagues point to examples of pain and suffering in the world as evidence that there is no God. But he turns their argument around by saying if suffering did not exist humans would be living in a perfect world.

"You are asking for a world where no one ever gets sick and to live in a padded room where you can never hurt yourself and no one can ever hurt you," he answers the skeptics. "There would be no opportunity to display courage, cure disease, solve social ills. In short, your idea is that if there were a God we'd already be living in heaven."

Sloan said that the Rome congress would hardly end the debate over evolution, but instead will reflect upon current scientific understanding of Darwin's theory. He said one question remains: How can we accept evolutionary theory and also defend the differences between human beings and the natural world? "What's needed," he explained, "is a new kind of dialogue in which Christianity and Catholicism is quite willing to accept the input of the natural sciences but also add to it the remarkable nature of the human being."

Jewish, Catholic leaders to tackle religious strife representatives who will meet regularly to deal with struggles as they arise.

Though Jewish and Catholic groups have met frequently since the conclusion of the Second Vatican Council in 1965, this new dialogue is considered the first continuous and overarching panel between the two religions. It will be based at the Pope John Paul II Cultural Center, as requested by the Vatican.

The inaugural topics for the group that came together Feb. 26 included:

— Tensions over Pope Benedict lifting the excommunication of Bishop Richard Williamson, who has publicly denied the extent of the Holocaust.

— The long-standing controversy over the sainthood cause of Pope Pius XII, the World War II pontiff accused by Jewish leaders of not doing enough or saying enough in defense of the Jews and other victims of the Nazis.

— The Vatican's 2008 publication of Pope Benedict's revised prayer for the Jews for use in extraordinary form of the Mass Good Friday liturgies, which prays that Jews will recognize Jesus, the savior, and that "all Israel may be saved."

"In the past months, these have been troubling times, especially in the Jewish community as a whole," said Rabbi Irving Greenberg, founder and president of the National Jewish Center for Learning and Leadership, known as CLAL.

"We did have spirited discussions today, but no one walked out or blew up, and there was more consensus than disagreement," he said.

Proactive efforts

The nearly 30 U.S. Jewish and Catholic leaders chose Feb. 26 to meet in Washington because it marked the 30th day since the death of Rabbi Leon Klenicki, a pioneer in interfaith dialogue and a contemporary and friend of Pope John Paul II, said Abraham Foxman, national director of the Anti-Defamation League.

Since Rabbi Klenicki had been committed to constructive Jewish-Catholic relations, the leaders decided to discuss their differences in a conference as a way of honoring the interfaith stalwart, Foxman said.

The new panel, whose participants organizers hope to have confirmed by May 1, is another way of honoring Rabbi Klenicki, said Father Dennis McManus, assistant director of the Pope John Paul II Cultural Center.

"There is going to be wide representation of leaders who will engage in ongoing dialogue," Father McManus told Catholic News Service following a press conference announcing the new group. "The idea is to have a standing dialogue so we can address concerns as they arise, and not be just reactive."

Explaining excommunication

During the hourlong press conference — which was delayed by an hour because the delegations' talks went on longer than expected — Jewish representatives stressed they were still not satisfied with the handling of the Bishop Williamson situation and maintained that stronger action by Pope Benedict would be appropriate.

Catholic leaders also expressed their embarrassment over Bishop Williamson's remarks aired on Swedish television stating that the Holocaust was exaggerated and that no Jews died in Nazi gas chambers.

The Catholics leaders also said they needed to disassociate themselves from clergy who don't embrace the teachings of the Catholic Church, which recognizes the Holocaust as a great tragedy in history.

Boston Cardinal Sean P. O'Malley explained that Pope Benedict's lifting of the excommunication only allows Bishop Williamson to receive the sacraments of the church, but doesn't permit him to serve as a Catholic bishop, and his full union with the church will only happen if he embraces the spirit of Vatican II, which acknowledged the Holocaust.

"Vatican II affirmed the number of Jews who died in the Holocaust," said Cardinal William H. Keeler, retired archbishop of Baltimore, who is the U.S. bishops' moderator of Catholic-Jewish affairs. "It was the wish of (Pope) John XXIII that the council was to make it so Catholic teaching couldn't be used as an excuse to hit at Jewish people."

The Vatican has said Bishop Williamson would not be allowed to function as a bishop in the church unless he disavowed his remarks about the Holocaust and publicly apologized. Since then he has expressed regret for the remarks he made, but a Vatican spokesman said Feb. 27 that the bishop's statement does not meet the Vatican's demand that he publicly recant his position.

The Feb. 26 gathering in Washington was being trumpeted as the most significant gathering of Catholic and Jewish leaders since Pope Benedict's two events with Jewish audiences during his 2008 U.S. visit. Religious leaders called the formation of the new dialogue group a historic event.

"A thousand years from now we will see this as one of the great transforming accomplishments in our long-shared history," Rabbi Greenberg said.

Rabbi says trip to Israel can help pope show his respect for Judaism

BY CINDY WOODEN
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

ROME — Poland's chief rabbi said he hopes Pope Benedict XVI's trip to Israel will be an opportunity for the pope to demonstrate to the world his deep knowledge of and respect for Judaism.

Rabbi Michael Schudrich, the U.S.-born chief rabbi of Poland, said the May trip can be "very enlightening and help Pope Benedict show in a very clear way" the sensitivity and respect that has been clear in his writings for decades.

"I am full of hope," the rabbi told Catholic News Service March 2 after delivering the second annual Pope John Paul II Lecture on Interreligious Understanding at Rome's Pontifical University of St. Thomas Aquinas.

Rabbi Schudrich's speech focused on how he learned from "the life and actions" of Pope John Paul about the importance of interreligious dialogue and of being willing to learn from members of other religions.

But the rabbi said he could not talk about Catholic-Jewish relations without acknowledging that "it clearly was very painful" when Pope Benedict lifted the excommunication in January of traditionalist Bishop Richard Williamson, who had denied the extent of the Holocaust.

"It is not my place to tell or even suggest to Pope Benedict or the Vatican what they should or should not do," the rabbi said.

The incident has demonstrated that 40 years of improving relations make it possible for Jews and Catholics to speak openly when offended or hurt, he said.

"It is just because of the past 40 years of dialogue and discussions that we were able to face this dark moment," he said. "It was a test for us, but it also taught us that we have no other option than to rededicate ourselves to dialogue in an even deeper and more meaningful way."

In an interview after his speech, the rabbi said the Bishop Williamson affair caused many people to "jump to the conclusion" that Pope Benedict was not scandalized by Holocaust denial.

But Rabbi Schudrich said he and others who know the writings of the pope know that is not true.

"John Paul II was a great theological thinker, but even more, he knew how to get his point across" through his words and gestures, the rabbi said, adding that Pope Benedict's trip to Israel should give him an opportunity to do the same.

In his speech, the rabbi said Pope John Paul's attitude toward Judaism and other religions helped him discover a teaching present within Judaism as well: The fact that God created each person in his image and likeness means that each person has something to teach us.

"If God created us all as his children and created us so that all of us would learn to love him and each other, then it must be the fulfillment of God's plan when we seek inspiration and truth from each other," the rabbi said.

"The more I am open to other religions, the better Jew I become," he said. "Furthermore, when I close myself off from the outside world, I limit my access to the rays of light, truth and wisdom" present in others.

"This philosophy is so profound, it so changed my view of the world, of my God and of myself, that all I can say is 'Thank you, Pope John Paul II for teaching me how to become a better person and a better Jew,'" Rabbi Schudrich said.

A girl eats outside her home in the Harare suburb of Epworth, Zimbabwe, Feb. 25. The country's economy is in ruins with runaway inflation and a nonfunctioning health care system. U.N. Secretary-General Ban Ki-moon has called on Zimbabwe's President Robert Mugabe to release detained activists and said such a move would help unlock international humanitarian support for the country.

Praying for a miracle

Zimbabwe one of 'biggest challenges' facing Africans, says cardinal

BY BRONWEN DACHS
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

Editor's note: This is part of a series in anticipation of Pope Benedict XVI's March 17-23 trip to Africa and the October Synod of Bishops on Africa.

CAPE TOWN, South Africa — One of the "biggest challenges" facing Africans today is the situation in Zimbabwe, said South African Cardinal Wilfrid Napier of Durban.

The country's economy is in ruins with runaway inflation, and in mid-February Doctors Without Borders reported that Zimbabwe's health care system, once a model for southern Africa, has collapsed.

Doctors Without Borders said the government is restricting and politicizing humanitarian aid relief.

Since 1994, the average life expectancy in Zimbabwe has fallen from 57 years to 34 years for women and from 54 years to 37 years for men, according to statistics from the U.N.'s World Health Organization.

After a meeting with Zimbabwean bishops in January, South Africa's bishops said that "Zimbabwe has moved from a crisis to a disaster to passive genocide."

"Zimbabwe's steady decline began around 1994," said Father Frederick Chiromba, secretary-general of the Zimbabwe Catholic Bishops' Conference.

After the country's independence from Britain in 1980, its education and health systems flourished and Zimbabwe was known as the breadbasket of the region, he said.

But even then President Robert Mugabe, who has ruled Zimbabwe since 1980, was intent on eliminating opposition.

In 1997, the Catholic Commission for Justice and Peace published its findings of the 1980s killings by the military of an estimated 20,000 people in the Zimbabwean region of Matabeleland.

In 1999 "the first real opposition" to Mugabe — the Movement for Democratic Change — was formed, Father Chiromba said.

He said "a good portion of its leaders were ZANU-PF (ruling party) members who saw the need for change."

Since the movement's formation, "there have been controversial electoral outcomes" and accusations of rigging in every presidential and parliamentary vote, he said.

Human rights groups have said that, since the March 2008 elections, opposition supporters have been the targets of brutal state-sponsored violence that left more than 80 dead and 200,000 displaced.

In mid-February Movement for Democratic Change leader Morgan Tsvangirai, who won the March 2008 elections, was sworn in as Zimbabwe's prime minister in a unity government.

Cardinal Napier, one of three papally appointed presidents of the October Synod of Bishops on Africa, noted that during the last synod, South Africa had its first all-race elections, ending years of strict racial segregation.

He said his "prayer is that another miracle, such as that in South Africa in 1994, will occur in the year of this synod that will provide hope for Zimbabweans."

service project known as The H2O Challenge, the youths are raising money and awareness for communities that don't have access to clean drinking water.

The challenge was issued by The H2O Project, a Texas-area nonprofit organization dedicated to bringing clean water to people who need it around the world.

Participants are asked to send the funds typically spent on sodas, juices and other drinks to organizations that drill wells in underdeveloped countries.

Focusing on the significance of sacrifice, the middle school-aged youths participated in the project during Lent.

"It was intentionally planned to start the Wednesday before Ash Wednesday to lead into the Lenten experience," said Susan Rabold, youth minister at St. Paul the Apostle Church.

This is the second time a group from the church has participated in the project. The high school youth group participated in the challenge in October, raising $960.

"It was so beneficial for them that we decided to have the program with our middle school youths," said Rabold.

Additionally, the confirmation class at St. Pius X Church in Greensboro will participate in the program during the coming weeks.

"The H2O Project indicates that a well costs about $2,500," said Rabold. "I feel that throughout the three programs, we'll meet the goal."

In addition to the fundraising, the project has an educational aspect.

"We do a program on water and social justice issues," Rabold said. "Then we explore this particular issue of communities that don't have clean water."

"My main focus is for them to get clean water. Water is the source of everything."

— Michael Sang

The youths at St. Paul the Apostle Church are specifically raising money to drill a well in Rubet, Kenya — the home village of Michael Sang, a custodian at the church.

"Through Michael they have this connection," said Rabold. "He's very real to the kids."

Sang spoke to the youths about the challenges he faced growing up in a village that didn't have clean water.

"I grew up in a rural area where we had a lot of problems with water," Sang said.

"We had to travel three miles to get water," he said, and even then it was dirty.

When he found out that the youths wanted to raise money to drill a well in his home village, Sang said that it was an answer to his prayers.

"I was overwhelmed and happy," said Sang, who had been looking for a way to give back to his home village.

"My main focus is for them to get clean water," he said. "Water is the source of everything."

Africa has seen tremendous changes, but some issues remain

AFRICA, from page 1

South Africa," said Jesuit Father Peter Henriot, director of the Jesuit Center for Theological Reflection in Zambia's capital, Lusaka.

This October's special Synod of Bishops for Africa will focus on "service, peace and reconciliation and look at the challenges we need to pay attention to," he said.

Pope Benedict XVI is scheduled to present the synod's working document March 19 in Cameroon, on a trip that also includes a visit to Angola.

Bishops planning the October synod have emphasized the need to find concrete ways to apply results of their 1994 meeting "to an Africa thirsting for reconciliation and seeking justice and peace."

In interviews with Catholic News Service, church leaders spoke of how Africa has changed since 1994 and the challenges that remain.

U.S.-born Father Henriot, who has lived in Zambia since the late 1980s, said poor African countries "have become more entwined with globalization" since 1994.

"We have become more influenced by the economic and military concerns of other countries," Father Henriot said.

For example, a structural adjustment program imposed on Zambia by the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund "might have made the economy more efficient, but it has no social face," he said.

"We have lower literacy levels, a high AIDS rate and other health concerns," Father Henriot said, noting that such programs led to "curtailed budgets that had a negative impact on hospitals and schools."

"With the global economic crisis, the poor are becoming poorer with factors such as the price of basic foods in African countries being affected by skyrocketing prices in First World countries," he said.

Structure and success

Some Catholic officials spoke of how African countries are taking more responsibility for helping each other.

"To gain credibility internationally as a democratic continent," African leaders need "to hold each other accountable," said Jesuit Father Anthony Egan, a member of South Africa's Jesuit Institute who specializes in history and ethics.

Since 1994, "there have been strong developments in efforts to combat corruption," Father Egan said, noting that the African Peer Review Mechanism, an African self-monitoring system for member states of the African Union, was set up in 2003.

Although African leaders "have failed in terms of calling (Zimbabwean President Robert) Mugabe to order," there are signs that this reluctance "to be seen attacking a fellow African leader" is changing, he said.

South African Cardinal Wilfrid Napier of Durban, one of three papally appointed presidents of the October synod, said Catholic leaders in many African countries have been coming to South Africa for help with setting up effective justice and peace structures.

Countries such as Sudan, Rwanda, Congo, Ethiopia and Malawi are looking to Catholics in South Africa to show how they recovered from the years of the strict racial segregation system of apartheid.

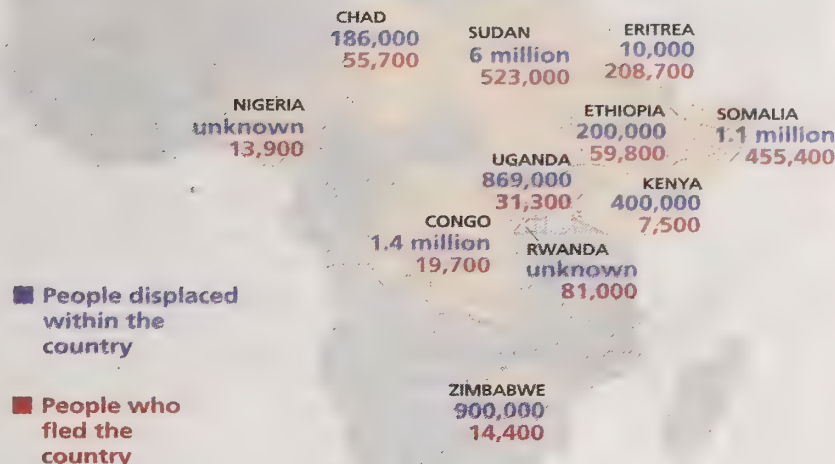

Cardinal Napier told CNS the Pretoria-based Denis Hurley Peace Institute was set up in 2005 to enable the Southern African Catholic Bishops' Conference to "respond to continental demands."

For instance, he said, in December he and Father Sean O'Leary, director of the institute, traveled to Burundi, which had emerged from years of civil war.

seeking help setting up a truth and reconciliation commission on the lines of the South African commission that dealt with human rights abuses under apartheid.

"We also went to Sudan to share information on how the church in South Africa dealt with issues of justice" during and after apartheid, Cardinal Napier said, noting that "we share stories to enable the church in other countries to strengthen our successes and eliminate our pitfalls in their own work."

Cardinal Napier spoke of other changes to the Catholic Church in Africa.

He said that since the last African synod, the Inter-Regional Meeting of Bishops of Southern Africa, representing Catholics in nine countries, "has held at least three successful conferences, focusing on self-reliance, strategic planning and good governance."

Other regional bishops' conferences have had similar meetings.

On the continent, interreligious dialogue, especially between Christians and Muslims, "has improved enormously," the cardinal said.

He noted that Archbishop John Olorunfemi Onaiyekan of Abuja, Nigeria, co-chairs the African Council of Religious Leaders that was established in 2003. He also said social communications have improved with the setting up of Catholic radio stations in many African countries.

'Complicated battles'

The political landscape in many countries has changed, too. Since the 1994 Rwandan genocide, in which an estimated 937,000 people were killed, the country has undergone a "gradual democratization," said Father Egan.

But while the country "has stabilized and its infrastructure has improved dramatically" with the rebuilding of schools and hospitals, "the hostilities and prejudices (between ethnic Tutsis and Hutus) still run deep," said Father Egan.

These prejudices, which "have gone underground since the shock of the genocide," arise from "a combination of tribalism and tensions over economic resources and power," he said.

In 2002 Angola ended a 27-year civil war in which more than 1.5 million people were killed and, today, relations between the church and state are good, said Father Belmiro Chissengueti, who heads the justice and peace department of the bishops' conference of Angola and Sao Tome.

He said church officials are "pleased that the Angolan president has committed himself" to the process of drafting a new constitution.

"For the first time church and civil society will have a chance to participate in the process," he said.

In Mozambique, a civil war ended in 1992 after a Catholic lay organization, the Sant'Egidio Community, helped broker a peace deal. The community made similar efforts in strife-torn Algeria.

Yet problems remain. Angola is Africa's second-largest oil producer, after Nigeria, and is rich in diamonds, but most Angolans live on less than $2 a day, and one in four children dies before age 5.

Fighting has intensified in Sudan and threatens the 2005 Comprehensive Peace Agreement that ended more than two decades of civil war that left 2 million dead and displaced 4 million. And since the last synod, Sudan has been accused of genocide in its western region, Darfur.

"These are complicated battles," Father Egan said, noting that in Congo, "a guerrilla movement in the East was destroyed by a combination of the Congolese and Rwandan armies."

Congo is "a complex country that is loosely run," he said. "It's a network of cities and villages and large areas that have little contact with the rest of the world."

The country is rich in resources, including diamonds, "which is why it has so much conflict," Father Egan said.

Moving spiritual memoir tells of novelist's return to Catholicism

REVIEWED BY NANCY L. ROBERTS
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

"What happens when faith returns? What happens when one goes back to the church of one's childhood?" In this deeply felt spiritual memoir, Anne Rice asks and explores these questions.

The famous novelist, author of "Interview With the Vampire" and many other books, tells how, in 1998 at the age of 57, she came to believe in God again and to re-embrace her Catholic faith.

Raised as a devout Irish Catholic, Rice once seriously considered entering the convent. But as a young adult, she lost her belief in God and was an atheist for nearly 40 years.

Then, in 2005, longtime readers of her many tales of good and evil among vampires and otherworldly beings were amazed when Rice produced a novel, "Christ the Lord: Out of Egypt," to critical acclaim. It was followed by another, "Christ the Lord: The Road to Cana."

These compelling explorations of Christ's humanity seemed a major departure from Rice's earlier literary path. Yet those earlier vampire stories that had made her name a household word had often contained an implicit moral quest — perhaps a reflection of Rice's perennial pondering on how to live a meaningful life.

In "Called Out of Darkness," Rice reveals the fascinating details of her journey back to faith. For her, practicing her Catholic faith and believing in Jesus as God are essential to living meaningfully.

Rice's narrative starts with her New Orleans girlhood and eloquently traverses the terrain of her Catholic schooling there; the sadness of her mother's drinking; her life in radical Berkeley, Calif., during the hippie era; her 41-year marriage to her beloved high school sweetheart, Stan Rice; the death of their little daughter to leukemia; the joyous birth of their son; the family's return to New Orleans in 1988; and Stan's too-early death in 2002, of brain cancer.

Rice weaves her earliest memories into a rich tapestry. She uses the full measure of her gifts as a storyteller to evoke the physical, emotional and spiritual world she knew. A fascinating motif is how such "preliterate aesthetic experiences" intermingled with her early "religious experiences" to have a profound impact on her.

Among the latter, she singles out her interaction on the day of her first Communion with a simple hospital "kitchen sister, all in white with an apron, ... telling me with a radiant face that this was a wonderful day because my soul was so pure. She was thin, almost wraithlike, and she made me think of driftwood; but the look of joy on her face and the enthusiasm with which she said these words were breathtaking to me."

Many years later, on a December day in 1998, Rice recalled her "mother's words of decades ago," as she had roused the family to get up for Mass: "He (Jesus Christ) is on that altar. Get up and go."

"I believed that what she'd said so many years ago was precisely the truth," Rice writes. "He was on that altar. And I wanted to go to him, and the impelling emotion was love."

What about the pedophilia scandal, the ban against women priests, the church's official stance regarding gays? "In the moment of surrender, I let go of all the theological or social questions which had kept me from him for countless years. I simply let them go," she writes.

Yet "Called Out of Darkness" is hardly pat. Its pages illuminate the often complex challenges of faith and its practice that Christians face in the modern world. And Rice is refreshingly forthright about her own imperfections, her flaws and her brokenness.

At the end, the reader is left with a feeling of gratitude for Rice's moving account of her faith journey.

Lent allows opportunities to 'keep it real' with God

BY SHARON PERKINS
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

After the beatification of Mother Teresa of Calcutta in 2003, it was revealed that her private correspondence chronicled years of intense feelings of abandonment by God, coinciding with the period of her heroic ministry among India's poorest.

In 2008, the publication of Dorothy Day's personal journals corrected previous misconceptions about her relationship with her daughter Tamar during the early years of the Catholic Worker movement.

In both instances, the candidly private reflections of these publicly holy yet transparently "real" women exposed complex dimensions of their humanity and offered us more profound insights into what it means to be a follower of Jesus.

I recently resumed the discipline of keeping a spiritual journal as an aid to prayer, and I am often struck by my entries' stark truthfulness about both the encouraging and more disheartening aspects of my relationship with God.

The beauty of writing for my eyes only is that I can articulate my hidden issues, ignoble motivations and deeply buried struggles and aspirations — things that God already knows but which I keep masked from public view and my own view as well. My journal helps me "keep it real."

On the surface, today's readings deal with activities in the public sphere: Israel is given prohibitions regarding idolatry, stealing, killing and coveting; Jerusalem merchants are buying and selling in the Temple precincts; and eyewitnesses of Jesus' signs are quick to believe in his name and follow him.

But all have an underlying private dimension, and as the psalmist reminds us, the "law of the Lord" is first directed toward the conversion of the human heart before it is ever to have consequences for human conduct.

Many of the spiritual practices associated with Lent are external and public — penance services, charitable works and "giving up" certain vices. The Lenten practice most vital to our continuing conversion, however, is scrutinizing and bringing to light the inconsistencies between our private and our public selves.

For Catholic catechumens preparing for baptism, this is ritualized in the "scrutinies" on certain Sundays of Lent. For the baptized, it's "examining one's conscience." But simply put, the practices of Lent give us opportunities to unmask our true selves, "keep it real" and invite Jesus into that personal reality which is already known to God.

Questions:

What are some aspects of my private life that are inconsistent with what I profess publically as a follower of Jesus? What can I do this Lent to "keep it real" and be more honest with myself and with God?

Scripture to be Illustrated:

"But Jesus ... did not need anyone to testify about human nature. He himself understood it well" (John 2:25).
